Flak hats

The Department of Education and Science was all prepared for a big bang when the latest Black Paper was published last month. It was Mr R. W. Baldwin's article on examination results—he sent a copy to the DES last October—that had them bothered.

Statisticians in the department were put to work on Mr Baldwin's figures. They added to them the unpublished O level figures for 1975. These showed that 17.14 per cent of pupils in all maintained schools taken together passed five or more O levels or CSE grade 1 compared with 17.84 per cent in 1974—continuing the decline since 1971.

Lines of defence were accordingly prepared by civil servants for their political masters lest they be caught on the hop by embarrassing questions. And a pretty thin defence it was. The department's statisticians could sound all the routine notes of caution about only comparing like with like and never being sure when like was like; about runs of figures since the leaving age was raised being too short to show any trend, etc.

They could point out that the statistical device used by Mr Baldwin to allow for the effects of creaming was one suggested by themselves after they had studied his earlier paper, The Great Comprehensive Gamble, and that he had not used it quite in the way they had suggested. But they could not dodge the main point.

The figures show that from 1971 to 1975 direct grant grammar and independent schools improved their achievement in examinations, though not by any where near as much as they had between 1966-71. But examination performance in the maintained sector as a whole has dropped since 1971. In other words more able school leavers in maintained schools taken together have since 1971 done progressively worse in public examinations.

So ministers and officials alike donned their flak hats, climbed into their trenches and waited. Imagine their amazement as the skirmishers dashed off after Mr Baldwin's comparisons—in the later part of his paper—between selective and comprehensive schools within the maintained sector, totally ignoring the blanket indictment of the maintained system as a whole in the early part.

Shared experience

St Andrews, where the North Sea gales howl more theatrically than any wind machine, seems an unlikely venue for a student drama festival. You can buy Jacobite shortbread and Abernethy biscuits a lot more easily than afternoon tea in this Tannochbrae sur mer. And there is strictly no booze on Sunday.

But it proved a perfect setting for the twenty-second festival. The intimate atmosphere meant meeting the same old faces—getting older and saner as the week went by, until it was not only the walls who had ears, the very door knobs stood waiting for the clangers to drop. Instead of busloads of agents, doling out contracts, there was only Michael Green peddling Coarse Acting parts for The Colliers Tuesday Tea Time. Casting King Lear as a blasted miner was not a bad coup, but it proved much harder to find a Coarse Acting table, all of whose legs would fall off. The performance was indescribable.

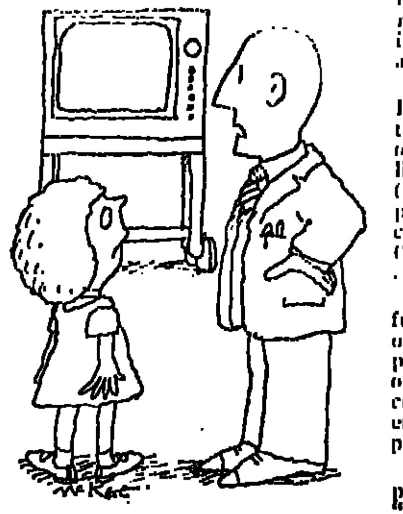
Besides all the acting, there were riveting discussions which gave everyone a chance to lacerate each production. It soon became clear that producers' intentions often bore no relation to what anyone had seen —or to anything at all for that matter. A learned man from the BBC explained the political significance of three dead flies which the audience never saw and several mindless gems appeared, like the statement that Shakespeare had not a clue what he was writing about. Producer Martin Jenkins discussed the deeper significance of plays at a rate of two per minute and while the Shared Experience Company performed licentious tales, remaining fully clothed all the time, director Clifford Williams remarked endearingly that he often failed to notice whether actors were clothed or not. Which gives him carte blanche, I suppose.

Fortified bunker

"Lindown Primary was located in the plusher part of Kensington, and had a reputation for good teaching, and generally good pupils. Mr Seaborn had seen to that, of course, supervising an operation to get the neighbours feeling a little safer."

Richard Hayes is an author with a sharp eye for details of school (and playground) life. Which isn't altogether surprising, since he wrote the first version of The Secret Army, published this week (Macmillan, £2.95) when he was 12.

It was (in encouraging terms) rejected by two publishers, so he rewrote it as a TV series (another encouraging rejection from BBC), then a film script (rejection slip from United Artists). It also went through several more drafts as a novel. His next novel is ready for publication this autumn, and the one after that is with the publishers. He is now 16.



"What on earth makes you think that's God, Jane?"

The Secret Army is a rattling thriller, with goodies (boys, teachers, ILEA, the Army) fighting it out with baddies (girls, controlled by a dangerous lady getting her own back on parents and husband) in and around Lindown Primary.

It is to be hoped that Peter Newsam and his men take heart from the stirring role played by the ILEA Special Council, with its special fortified underground headquarters and fleets of helicopters—though the teachers, at first, assume that the ILEA Special Council must be the enemy.

Richard Hayes himself was away this week. People who know him say he takes himself very seriously indeed, as a writer, and has a strong sense of professionalism—and a feeling that there is an untapped market for books written mainly for schoolchildren, with tight plots and realistic detail based on school life seen from inside. He is very interested in comics—his stepfather runs a science fiction and comic bookshop where he works after school.

Teachers at his present school—Holland Park Comprehensive, find him a polite and serious and conscientious boy—it seems his streaks of fantasy get saved for real writing. They should enjoy his next, and apparently very funny, book The Forbidden Teachers—the story of a clash between parents and teachers in a trendy London comprehensive. The author, I'm told, is on the side of the teachers.

Reader, come back

The Library Association's centenary public libraries conference held at Warwick University recently took as its theme the user — a welcome change after years of attention to techniques, management systems and computerization.

Some of the librarians there saw this as part of an evolutionary process moving from nineteenth-century obsession with buildings through an era of prestige stock acquisition to the client; others as a reflection of general interest in consumers. The worldly wise reckoned that wooing the reader is the brightest move when budgets are under attack.

The research workers on the Hillingdon project, reviewed in the TES (October 10, 1976) pointed out the discrepancy between the librarian's view of the library (full of friendly staff advising purposive readers wanting high-class books) with the public's view ("You can see the council stigma . . . as soon as you walk in").

They, like other speakers, were full of ideas for loosening up layouts, replacing assumptions about public taste by evidence, and organizing libraries for the 75 per cent of users who just want an enjoyable book instead of the 25 per cent with specialized needs.

Cheshire's director of libraries produced an action plan for "discriminating in favour of this majority" by self-service organization and a two-tier system of neighbourhood "popular" libraries and full service central libraries — a radical change for a profession dominated for generations by a concept of individualized service.

The research findings on public attitudes were uncomfortable: buildings people were afraid to enter, staff too austere to be approached, stock inadequate and inappropriate, and an odd acceptance that "that's how libraries are, so it's no good complaining".

So it was a shock to hear, later, Will Wyatt of the BBC describe libraries as warm friendly places. That, however, did not seem to have lulled delegates into complacency. They went away muttering about matching stock more closely to demand, arranging libraries by interest groupings instead of Dewey, employing a marketing approach to promotion of use, and paying attention to the users.

Jubilee march

The Queen's Silver Jubilee Year is turning out to be a good time for patronage in the arts. The Co-op has been contributing its bit to the cultural scene by organizing (in conjunction with the National Schools Brass Band Association) a competition for schoolchildren up to the age of 18 for a "Royal Silver Jubilee Fanfare and March" to be played at jubilee festivals throughout the country and, they hope, in front of the Queen herself in May.

The judges (David Willcocks, Joseph Horovitz and Geoffrey Brand) met last week to choose the winner out of five finalists they had selected with great difficulty from more than 80 entries.

It was worth sitting through the overlong speeches in praise of the Co-op, it was worth enduring all the bad jokes while suspense mounted higher and higher as nine London musicians (conducted by Trevor Walmisley, of the CWS Manchester Band) played the five entirely different pieces. One or two were reminiscent of the Black Dyke Mills Band and the Cup Final, one was daringly contrapuntal, another bordered on the smoochily vulgar.

They all sounded as if their composers had been writing for brass bands all their lives — but the winning composition with the spare dignity of its fanfare, its intense middle section for bass trombone and percussion and its overall shape and sense of purpose stood out clearly from the others.

George Benjamin (18 and a pupil of Charles Brett at Westminster School) won £1,500 worth of instruments for his school and £100 for himself, shook hands with Malcolm Williamson, that right royal composer, and took the baton into his own confident hands for another triumphant hearing. Long may he reign.

Watch out for this man. He has been seen already in one school at least posing as a trainee HMI. If you see him step up and challenge him with the words: "You are James Hamilton, permanent secretary at the DES and I claim my five pounds."

Apparently Mr Hamilton assumed this guise at a Manchester school some months ago. The assembled senior staff were most amazed when apparently the junior member of the visiting party suddenly took charge of a meeting at the end of the day.

CHANGING POSTAGE RATES

In the good old days of the Penny Post, one could send 240 letters for £1: nowadays one can send only 15 letters at 6½p each and have 2½p change from £1, or 12 letters (11 at 8½p and 1 at 6½p) for £1 exactly. Paradoxically one can send more than 24 letters for £2 exactly, and more than 50 letters for £4 exactly.

(a) Why is this?

(b) What is the greatest number of letters for which the postage is exactly £3?

(c) To solve problems like these, one has to find positive integers for x and y that satisfy an equation of the type $13x + 17y = n$, where n is an even integer. Show that there is at least one solution when n is a multiple of 30.

(d) Given that $x = 5$, $y = 55$ is a solution to $13x + 17y = 1{,}000$. Find all the other solutions.

(e) How many solutions are there to the equation $13x + 17y = n$, when (i) $n = 2{,}000$, (ii) $n = 3{,}000$, (iii) $n = 4{,}000$, (iv) $n = 5{,}000$?

(v) What is the least value of n that provides two solutions?

(vi) Show that if $x = p$, $y = q$, is a solution, then $x = p + 17$, $y = q - 13$, is another solution (when $q > 13$) and that the general solution is $x = p + 17m$, $y = q - 13m$, where m is an integer, positive or negative.

A CONJURING TRICK WITH A PAIR OF NUMBERS

Ask a friend to choose a pair of numbers, one less than 10 and the other greater than 10, and to perform these calculations. When he tells you his answer, you can immediately tell him the pair of numbers that he chose.

(i) Add the two numbers.
(ii) Multiply by 5.
(iii) Add on the smaller number.
(iv) Multiply by 2.
(v) Subtract the smaller number.

If your friend tells you that his answer is 219, you can tell that he chose 9 and 12.

What numbers were chosen when the answer is: (a) 273, (b) 501, (c) 197, (d) 176, (e) 999, (f) 1,009? Can you see how the trick works, and why?

SOLUTIONS

Changing postage rates: (a) The postage on x letters at 6½p and y letters at 8½p is $(6\frac{1}{2}x + 8\frac{1}{2}y)$ pence: if this is exactly £2, then $13x + 17y = 400$. One solution in integers is $x = 2$, $y = 22$, so that $x + y = 24$. But another solution is found by adding 17 to the value of x, and subtracting 13 from the value of y: hence $x = 19$, $y = 9$, and $x + y = 28$. This shows that 28 letters cost exactly £2 in postage. For £4 the equation is $13x + 17y = 800$, and the solutions for (x, y) are (4, 44), (21, 31), (38, 18), (55, 5). The last solution shows that 60 letters cost exactly £4 in postage. (b) The equation for £3 is $13x + 17y = 600$, which has solutions (3, 33), (20, 20), (37, 7), which shows that 44 letters is the greatest number that can be posted for £3 exactly. (a) $13x + 17y = 30m$ is satisfied by $x = m$, $y = m$. So that there is at least one solution when n is a multiple of 30. (d) Other solutions are (22, 42), (39, 29), (56, 16), (73, 3). (e) (i) $13x + 17y = 2{,}000$ has a solution $x = 10$, $y = 110$, and so other solutions are $x = 10 + 17m$, $y = 110 - 13m$, where x and y are positive integers for values of m from 0 to 8, so that there are 9 solutions. Another general formula for solutions is $x = 17m - 500$, $y = 500 - 13m$, where m lies between 29 and 39. (ii) The general solution is $x = 17p - 750$, $y = 750 - 13p$, where p lies between 44 and 58; i e, 13 solutions. (iii) General solution $x = 17q - 1{,}000$, $y = 1{,}000 - 13q$; 18 solutions. (iv) $x = 17r - 1{,}250$, $y = 1{,}250 - 13r$; 23 solutions. (v) $n = 251$ has solutions (18, 1) and (1, 14).

A conjuring trick with a pair of numbers

The numbers chosen were (a) 3 and 24. (b) 1 and 49. (c) 7 and 12. (d) 6 and 11. (e) 9 and 90. (f) 9 and 91. If the numbers chosen were x (less than 10) and y (more than 10) the result at each stage of the calculation is (i) $x + y$. (ii) $5x + 5y$. (iii) $6x + 5y$. (iv) $12x + 10y$. (v) $11x + 10y = 10(x + y) + x$. So the units figure in the answer is x, the smaller number chosen, and if we subtract this from the remaining figures $(x + y)$ we obtain the larger number chosen. If the answer is 247, the smaller number was 7 and the larger 24—7=17. You had better practise this by yourself before trying to impress your friends with your prowess.

As the local election campaign warms up, Labour politicians are being forced to come to terms with the political realities behind the Great Debate and the hazards of the revisionist education policies initiated last autumn by Mr Callaghan and Mrs Williams.

Of course the local elections will not turn on education: they will be decided by the mood of the electorate on the spectrum of national issues on which the credit of the governing party depends, with employment, inflation, industrial relations and living standards figuring much more prominently in the political argument than education.

Even so, it is already possible to detect murmuring among Labour's Israelites as they journey through the desert. Whose side is Mrs Williams on, they ask? Has her attempt to pinch the Tory clothes been too successful—does she now stand so fully arrayed in Conservative garments that her own supporters fail to recognize her? Are they being obliged to shed their own party clothes at her bidding, while lacking the flexibility of mind (or principle) required to don those of their traditional opponents?

A letter to The Times on Tuesday offered an example of the kind of poser which Mrs Williams is setting her own supporters—not just the local councillors who have to stand on the hustings, but also the rank and file Labour supporters within the education service as well as without. "I must say", wrote Mr W. Roderick Dow, a teacher from Paignton, Devon, "that I am aghast at the glib statement by Mrs Williams . . . that she regards 'small sixth forms struggling to provide a limited number of A levels courses as profoundly unsatisfactory'. Who is responsible for the situation if not the party Mrs Williams represents?"

Not all Mrs Williams's infectious enthusiasm can brush aside a palpable hit. The anxieties which the Prime Minister decided to articulate—the potential political time-bomb he sought to defuse—included genuine doubts about all-through comprehensive schools as they have been hastily improvised in many parts of the country. The Labour Party, nationally and locally, has been the party whose political commitment launched comprehensive reorganization: neither the party nor Mrs Williams can avoid the flak when honesty (and political astuteness) forces them to recognize weaknesses in what they have brought about. The sixth form review is one aspect of this; the HMIs' report on Modern languages in comprehensive schools is another. There is no escaping the damage which this confessional exercise must do to the short-term prospects of Labour in education; but, the argument runs, commonsense requires that the facts have to be faced, and the balance of long-run political advantage requires action to prevent the Conservatives from capturing the political credit for bringing these concerns to the forefront.

Mrs Williams might reasonably hope that the negative phase—the crying of stinking fish—is nearly over. The Great Debate travelling circus has come to rest, and a positive phase is about to open with a Green Paper due within the next two months outlining ways of remedying weaknesses. It will be too late to save Labour's blushes in the May elections, but they were a lost cause, anyway. From now on Mrs Williams will project new and hopeful schemes which will combine the political virtues of optimism and thrift. Great pains have, in any case, been taken to make sure that most of the odium falls on the teachers, rather than the policies adopted by Labour Secretaries of State and local authorities. No doubt the Green Paper will carry this forward by presenting a new, vigorous, interventionist policy by the wise DES and its gifted political head as the necessary means of preventing the mischievous teachers from perpetuating the consequences of half-baked comprehensive schemes, tiny sixth forms, ill-prepared mixed ability teaching, and the process of spreading the butter too thin which the HMIs identified as symptomatic of trying to extend language teaching to the whole age-range.

Mrs Williams has a task of the greatest delicacy. There is no one who could attempt it with a better chance of success than she, but it is a formidable challenge to her powers of persuasion. She is, in effect, asking her supporters to adopt new criteria by which to be judged—or rather a set of criteria far closer to traditional educational values than the trendy progressive shibboleths which bodies like the Socialist Education Association wished on the gullible Labour movement. She is determined to assert the value of competence in basic skills—which ordinary people never ceased to regard as important — as part of the liberal ideal and not allow it to be appropriated by the Conservatives. Nor is she prepared to allow the Conservatives to claim to be the tenants of the House of Intellect: she is determined to wean Labour's education supporters from the anti-academic prejudice which until now has been thought to befit the champions of secondary education for all—to retain and restate, in fact, her party's commitment to what might be called the grammar school tradition as one of the ingredients in the new comprehensive school ideal.

All this implies a much more pragmatic approach to some of the educational issues on which the politics of education have turned in recent years. To an extent which must be distressing to her left-wing opponents, but encouraging to a wide range of central opinion, it seems to offer a real chance of developing a new consensus on which to base an education policy for the years of declining population. Provided, that is, her own supporters can walk with her on the tightrope she has chosen, and Mrs Thatcher's henchmen can resist the opportunistic temptation to do their best to push her off.

Mrs Williams' game bid

One of the worst services which Labour Governments have performed in recent years has been to degrade the respectable legal notion of a contract, in order to exploit it as a political metaphor. The most obvious example was the Social Contract—falsely purloined from Locke and Rousseau—to define a relationship between the Government and the trade unions in which the obligations of both sides were fluid and unenforceable and which is now in the process of collapsing under the weight of its own emptiness.

Now along comes Mrs Williams with another exercise in grandiloquent vacuity—a so-called parent's contract which on present showing promises to be a mildly insulting public relations gesture.

No doubt it would be wise to wait for the Green Paper to spell out the details (though many will share the scepticism of Mr Fred Jarvis who has already dismissed it as "fatuous"). If the proposed "document" (not a contract, of course, because as Mrs Williams recognizes, it will have absolutely no legal validity) adds up to nothing more than asking parents to promise to be good—a parental equivalent of Signing the Pledge—not only will the politicians have further debased the language, but they will have made themselves and, in this case, those in the schools accidentally associated with them a little more ridiculous than they were before.

Examining the common core

At first sight, the Associated Examining Board's comments on the core curriculum and how examinations might respond to an attempt to standardize such a common core, do not take the argument very far. In examination terms, they envisage the award of a group certificate for candidates who achieve an approved mix of passes at somewhere below O level standard and separate single subject certificates for those who fail to make the grade across the whole of the prescribed range.

It is difficult to see how this adds up to much more than giving the people who now get a reasonable spread of O levels a single certificate to brandish in the face of employers, instead of giving them a bunch of separate pieces of paper.

It would also, presumably, have some marginal effect in persuading candidates to make sure they offer a suitable mix and therefore help schools steer pupils into sensible choices. It is presented in mainly O level terms but the assumption is that it could be reconciled with a single examining system at 16-plus by the addition of optional papers and the adjustment of grades.

The board has done the juggling with subject groups implicit in this kind of exercise which leads to such controversial groupings as science and a modern language in a single group. By pitching its exercise just below the O level standard it obviously invites comparisons with the old School Certificate. In fact, of course, this is not an essential element—it could as easily be based on a lower standard.

The main object seems to be to get away from the misleading terminology which can now award a General Certificate of Education to a candidate who gains "no more than a low grade in just one subject". This it would do, but whether the game is worth that particular candle is doubtful.

Art of the possible

It is curious that a society so keen to open the doors and windows of the mind in matters of literacy and numeracy—and supposedly so eager to encourage self-expression—should so ignore the education of the eye.

One may search the annals of the great debate in vain for more than a passing reference to it. Yet, as art teachers will certainly avow, it is the third leg of the educational stool, without which the balance between the head and the heart is difficult to maintain. The intellect that knows only what it can express in words and numbers is barren indeed.

A timely reminder of the importance of a genuine visual education has come from the National Society for Art Education, which is launching a campaign to redress the balance. It finds little comfort in the fact that so many children spend so much time in their early school years clutching crayon and brush, and argues that, although they are engaged in self-expression of a kind, they would eventually be better prepared by purposeful striving after improvement, with models of excellence as guides.

The suggestion is not that children should pursue only the conventional but rather that they master the skills that will enable them to be successfully unconventional later should they so wish, and in doing so to develop powers of visual discrimination that would stand them in good stead in the practical matters of life.

The art teachers' manifesto comes at an opportune moment. How to incorporate the arts into a core curriculum—and give them the same recognition claimed by other basic subjects—is one of the questions which, no doubt, the ever-diligent HMIs are currently wrestling with as they pore over their curricular blueprints. The NSAE will not be the only people who eagerly await their answers—and measure them against the trained staff available.

Manna from Annan

Harry Judge

It may well be true, as we all admit with a tired smile and a shrug, that in this country reports of committees and commissions never get accepted or applied. If a Prime Minister, or a Government, or above all a Minister of Education, does not know what to do or how to do it—then a recipe exists in the top drawer of every Whitehall desk.

Choose a prestigious chairman (preferably an actual or potential peer), mix in a goodly sprinkling of the great and the good, blend a little expertise with a great deal of diffuse experience, spice with a little radicalism, concoct slightly fuzzy terms of reference, and allow to simmer in a leaky vessel for at least three years.

By that comfortably remote time the issue will certainly have changed, and the Commons majority might have done. Even if a Government does actually receive the report it commissioned, then there is always a noisy postlude of consultations, papers Green and White, and parliamentary debates.

Three short years ago, Mr Roy Jenkins set up the committee on the future of broadcasting under the chairmanship of Lord Annan. Now his successor has 522 pages of a report to digest, and he and his successors will have to do something about it. Lord Annan, without illusions but not disillusioned, has a distinguished record for interest and effective intervention in the education business, although he must have been relieved this time not to be squandering his sparkling gifts of chairmanship and penmanship on the obstinate problems of Eton or Manchester Grammar School.

Still, it was anticipated that there were bound to be in the report many recommendations of direct interest to broadcasting for schools, and so there are. Before discussing some of them, I should like to make it absolutely clear that, although I happen to be a very recently appointed chairman of the School Broadcasting Council, everything written here is simply an expression of personal opinion. Moreover, my remarks will be confined to broadcasting designed specifically for schools.

If this narrow restriction is challenged, discussion becomes almost impossible. Obviously, a great deal of broadcasting—in current affairs, documentaries, or semipop history—is highly instructional as well as entertaining, and (like soap) good for children. A limited amount of merry sport can be derived from the distinctions between "educative" and "educational" broadcasting. Even if it gave up all school broadcasting, all FE programmes, and the Open University—which it will not—the BBC would still in effect be a major educational institution.

But school broadcasting is designed specifically for pupils in schools and transmitted at such times as they might be expected to be there—not, for example, at 8.10 pm on Boxing Day. Such a definition ensures that the debate about educational broadcasting will, like all real discussions, be embedded in the commercial and political context of arguments about resources, priorities, the use of air time, and the managerial structures of the providing agencies

All the more welcome, then, is Annan's stern refusal to go whoring after the multi-media packages, VCR's, prerecorded cassettes and all the rest of it. It would have been fatally easy for the committee to have wandered into the error of pinning its faith to the next technology but one. Indeed, Lord Annan himself might well have enjoyed—and nobody could have done it better—penning a few crushing paragraphs on the shortsightedness of those Luddites who think that conventional educational broadcasting has an indefinite future.

After all, if every school has its own VCR, and commercial enterprises can sell high quality programmes across the counter, why accept imprisonment in the straitjacket of simultaneous broadcasting and receiving? And what is the matter with automatic recording in the middle of the night? But on such speculative questions, Annan is clear and firm. Educational broadcasting will still be based on the assumption that most teachers will not have easy access to a VCR, are not going to be able to afford one, and would probably break it several times each week if they had one. Even with adequately maintained equipment, recording offers an additional flexibility rather than an alternative means of distribution.

Equally clear in the pages of Annan is the worrying doubt as to whether we know as much as we should and could about the effectiveness of school broadcasting. Of course, the BBC, the IBA and the companies inquire carefully into what schools want, how teachers perceive curricular needs, and how many schools listen to or watch which programmes. But in all these procedures, there is a grave—but hardly blameworthy—fault derived from the circumstances in which educational broadcasting, like nearly all contemporary educational practice, has developed.

Rising educational expectations, greater prosperity, a growing school population, greater sophistication in teaching methods, and the rapid growth of television—all these have been matched by an increase in the size and quality of the educational material rushing through the air. But times are now changing. It has, for example, been very reasonably assumed that—unless television and radio are not simply to titillate, or relieve a tobacco-craving teacher for 10 minutes—programmes should be accomanied by printed materials.

When schools were comparatively rich, that was not a problem. But the tightening pressures of economy have already ensured that schools can no longer afford such publications, or that they give a lower priority to such purchases than many of us would wish. One result may be that more programmes will be made independently of supporting materials. But then comes the problem upon which Annan indirectly touches.

Do we know enough about the nature and effectiveness of educational broadcasting to be able to distinguish between programmes which need other support, and those which do not? Even more fundamentally, do we have any workable theory of teaching which would help to identify the pedagogic tasks most appropriate to broadcasting in its various forms?

If these questions cannot be answered, educational broadcasting will be in a weak position as its competitors peer anxiously ove the fence which at present protec it. Why should the BBC spend come from licence fees, or the companies spend advertis revenue, on a public service which the value cannot be unam guously demonstrated?

Such arguments become m important as they lead into spec lations about the use of the fou channel, and the creation of the happily named Open Broadcasting Authority. It is, of course, pre cisely a decision about the channel—like the succession White Papers from both sides the House after the publication the Redcliffe-Maud report—that most likely to be determined b the politics of the day.

But, and not for education broadcasting alone, the Anna report has got it exactly right. O course, sticky questions of cont and balance have to be resolve but educationists should applau the prospect of an OBA whic would act as a publisher. Th dangers of duopoly and the adva tages of pluralism are sufficient clear to any attentive reader of the report, and the hope of a channe which would make a valuable addition to educational resources deeply attractive.

But there is one very real danger. Educational broadcasting must never be propelled into a ghetto, however comfortable, and especially if it is financed by direct grants: it must therefore secure a place on the other channels as well. There is plenty of room for argument about balance and proportions of time, but there are too many people who would wish to see education brushed under the carpet.

Local radio, especially if it does expand, is quite another matter. Here, and here alone, the Annan formula might have very unhappy results. It may, or may not, be the case that the BBC in its present shape is not well adapted to supporting one major sector of local radio. But the merging of the public and commercial empires in one network will certainly not serve the interests of children in the schools.

BBC local radio has much to offer in education and each station has an education producer. Anyone is free to switch on and make comparisons. The IBA itself told the committee that they considered educational broadcasting included "all output which tends to help members of the audience become better informed about local affairs and matters which touch on their daily lives". Really?

The Annan Report has 174 recommendations. Perhaps teachers will accept five extra and informal ones directed especially at them. They should

- Cheer for the OBA;
- Assert that broadcast programmes rather than packaged recordings will continue to be what they most need;
- Press both the broadcasting organizations and the educational funding agencies for more hard research into educational broadcasting;
- Fight against educational ghettoes of the air;
- Insist that educational does not mean educative.

This is a report after which something is going to happen, even if we all wait into the 1980s for the fourth channel. The important thing now is to establish a sense of direction and of public purpos

Letter to the Editor

Uneconomic sixth forms? They haven't done their sums

Sir,—Those who say that sixth forms, small though some may be, are uneconomic literally cannot know what they are saying.

Try a comparison between sixth forms and a sixth-form college. The first step is to look at the comparative cost of premises. In an area where school sixth forms are already established in expensive and difficult to reallocate specialist accommodation, removing them produces few savings. A little cleaning here, some heating there; but the rates still have to be paid and the roof mended. Nor can the freed areas readily be let to produce an income. The market in advanced sixth form laboratories is sluggish.

On the other hand, the premises which house a sixth-form college will always have a cost. Assume five schools each contributing 100 sixth-formers to a college for 500. Given insignificant savings on premises at the contributory schools, how much will the additional premises cost?

This has to be worked out, college by college. Until that has been done, and it has not been done nationally, one crucial element in the costing, the cost of teachers is the other, remains unknown. Hence, the impossibility of anyone knowing, and therefore being entitled to say, that sixth forms, small or otherwise, are uneconomic.

What are the costs of a 500 place sixth-form college of some 20,000 square feet likely to be? There will be wide variations. In my part of the world the annual revenue cost, assuming the use of existing premises rather than new ones, would be about £80,000, made up of £65,000 for servicing capital employed, or of savings foregone, and £15,000 in cleaning, maintenance and rates.

Incidentally, my own authority would require about 30 of these colleges at an extra annual cost of £2,400,000. Taking the annual cost of a teacher to be about £5,300, this would mean that the number of teachers we employed would have to be reduced by 450 just to balance the books.

To return to the five schools in my example, I suppose you would take three bites at them. First, you would remove 10 teachers from each school to start the 500-place college at 1:10. Picking your way over the ruins of the curriculum, you would then return to give notice to 15 teachers, three from each school, because 15 times £5,300 is about £80,000, the annual cost of the sixth-form college premises.

That would balance the books. Now for the third bite. To prove that the old order was uneconomic you would have to do better than break even financially. You would have to return to the schools (but I will stay in the car) and give notice to some more teachers. How many would depend on how uneconomic you wish to prove the now-vanished sixth forms to be.

In the example I have given, one economic and educationally sensible thing to do would be to ensure that two of the sixth forms cooperate by means of a common timetable and thereby create that epitome of economy, the 200-place sixth form.

ommon core xam plan 'to rop up standards'

Stephen Cohen

w examination designed to lo minimum standards in ls was put forward this week one of the country's biggest ex ing bodies.

Associated Examining Board suggested to Mrs Shirley Williams, the Education Secretary, there should be a common curriculum for all children would then take a common in at least five subjects.

would have to pass English age at the equivalent of GCE d Grade C, three other sub at the same level, and one at the slightly lower level of e D.

essful pupils would be ded the Certificate of General ation.

ren who failed to reach standards would be able to some another certificate for subject passed. A pupil who ed three Grade Cs and two Ds would get five pieces of r, but not the Certificate of al Education.

s common core curriculum ld be at a fairly low level, said hn Day, the AEB's assistant ary, "but there is nothing to harder papers being set for children". The board sees proposal as an answer to the e over a common system of ing at 16-plus.

proposal for a new system to e O level and CSE went to Williams last year from the ls Council. Under the AEB the Certificate of General Education could be awarded at two s—Class 1 for brighter pupils d Class 2 for those with a lower el of ability.

The five subjects to be taken will e to be chosen from four groups. glish language and mathematics the compulsory first group subts. Science, geography or a dern language are in group two. History, civics, social science or religious studies are in group three. Group four comprises literature, music, art, crafts, drama or practical subjects.

Some form of physical education would be compulsory but would not be examined.

Mr Bob Childs, secretary of the AEB, said the scheme could be introduced with little upheaval and at minimal cost. It had been prompted by the Great Debate. During the past 30 years the curriculum had changed and expanded and there had been a "continual withdrawal and relaxation of control, direction and coordination" in schools and colleges of education.

There was now a clear need to look again at the curriculum and relate it to the needs of adult life, of industry, commerce and further and higher education. "There is also a growing public demand for adequate coverage of the basic essentials."

The board has proposed a common core curriculum for groups of subjects identical to those which could be examined. This core will offer a basic level of skill, knowledge and experience irrespective of the pupil's ability. Some knowledge and understanding of the environment, of culture and general literacy will be expected.

Social and moral issues will be touched upon and children will be given some "aesthetic or creative experience" as well as taking part in physical activities.

"The common core would ensure some understanding and experience in the fields of general education essential to adult life without being undesirably restrictive of the educational aptitudes and interests of the individual."

Mr Childs said the Department of Education should give a lead to introducing the core subjects. "A DES report would be the first way of giving guidance."

ories in confidence drive

Conservative Party launches its ational education debate today a conference aimed at setting ene for a four-month drive to e standards and freedom in ols.

The programme starts at Manches with the first of three regional ences at which parents, teas, headmasters, educationists other interested groups will put views. The other conferences be at Ely, Cambridgeshire y 12) and Portsmouth (July 1). ects covered will include parenchoice and influence in schools, ole of exams and the school iculum, said Mr Norman St John-Stevas, the Tory spokesman.

A special conference to bring the aims of industry and education together will be held at Leicester on June 29. In conjunction with the Human Rights Society and the Social Morality Council a conference on the future of religious education will also be held in London in June.

"It is vital that we restore confidence in our educational system", said Mr St John-Stevas. "We must do all we can to increase standards of literacy and numeracy. Above all, we must give parents a greater say in the education of their children.

PM asked to back youth plan

The proposal to provide everyone under 18 with a guaranteed opportunity to work or learn is to be put directly to the Prime Minister on Wednesday. A delegation from the British Youth Council will urge him to accept the principle.

The details, which were outlined in the TES (March 25), are contained in the Holland report, which has been prepared by a working party of the Manpower Services Commission. The report will go before the 10 commissioners on Tuesday.

If the commissioners approve it, the report will go to the Secretary of State for Employment. It will not reach Mr Callaghan officially until the end of May. The Government would then need to reach a quick decision if the first stages of the new scheme are to be introduced in time to replace the present youth employment crisis counter measures, which run out this summer.

The British Youth Council delegation will consist of about a dozen young people from industry, youth organizations, and the political parties. It will be headed by Mr Tom Shebbeare, the secretary general.

Besides pressing for the "opportunity guarantee" the group will urge Mr Callaghan to give consideration to the major changes in economic strategy which the council is advocating as a long term solution to youth unemployment. These include shifting investment into labour intensive projects, work sharing, and the ending of efforts to reduce manning in, for example, the nationalized industries.

Since they would constitute a virtual abandonment of the drive for increasing productivity which has been a major preoccupation of every government since 1939, Mr Callaghan is unlikely to receive the proposals with immediate enthusiasm.

Pact with parents 'fatuous'

Mrs Shirley Williams's call for a contract between teachers and parents (page 9) was "fatuous", said Mr Fred Jarvis, general secretary of the National Union of Teachers, this week.

The Education Secretary had proposed that teachers should agree to teach children properly if parents undertook to send them to school well dressed and after a good breakfast, and a good night's sleep.

Mr Jarvis said the most charitable thing he could say about the idea was that it came at the end of a busy week for Mrs Williams. "Perhaps her department felt she needed some new gimmick."

But the idea was welcomed by the National Educational Research and Development Trust, based at Cambridge. Mr Barrie Knight, deputy director, said, "Parents properly consulted and drawn into the great education debate, have an enormous amount to contribute. But as far as they are concerned the debate has been the flop of the year."

Parents have always been largely excluded by the professionals, although they represent the biggest untapped pool of good will that exists in the entire educational field.

Adults forced out by fees

Student numbers in adult education have fallen by 10 per cent this year because of increased fees, said Mrs Shirley Williams, Secretary of State for Education and Science, this week.

She told the National Institute of Adult Education Conference at Lancaster University: "There have been substantial increases in fees, part of the general raising of fees to save the £28m required in 1977-78 from higher and further education."

This would have some impact on adult education student numbers which were now approaching three million overall. Early returns for 1976-77 showed a 10 per cent drop in recruitment.—THES.

Student numbers go on rising

The number of students in universities will go up by one third over the next 10 years, says the Association of University Teachers.

In a report published yesterday the association estimates that the increasing number of women going into higher education together with the growing numbers of mature students will force today's university student population of 272,500 up to 363,000 by 1986, despite the fact that after 1982 the number of 18-year-olds will start to drop.

The report emphasizes that when a similar drop occurred in this age range in the 1960s—from 906,000 in 1965 (as a result of the post-war "baby boom") to 741,000 in 1970—students numbers at university still continued to rise.

Since 1960 the number of women studying full-time at university has increased from 22,838 to this year's figure of 79,182—a rise of nearly 250 per cent. During the same period the male student population has risen from 67,025 to 143,710—a rise of 114 per cent.

Projecting the growth rate forward, it is estimated there will be 116,000 women students and 122,000 male students of United Kingdom origin aged under 25 by 1987.

Mature undergraduate students now form a significant part of the total entry each year, the report points out. Since 1967, the number of students over 25 is estimated to have grown from 7,251 to 12,156 in 1974, amounting by then to 6.4 per cent of the total of undergraduates.

Noting that current TUC policy is to encourage mature students at universities, the association considers this growth rate is likely to be maintained, giving a mature student entry of about 20,000 by 1982 and 28,000 by 1987.

Bearing in mind Government policy is to limit any further increase in overseas student numbers, the report assumes they will remain constant at 15,500 for undergraduates and 17,500 for postgraduates.

The number of postgraduates from overseas has doubled since 1967 from 8,827 to 17,466 this year, amounting to 35 per cent of the postgraduate total.

It is too early to know the effect of the large increase in tuition fees, but the report allows that there may be some fall in numbers of postgraduates from overseas. It assumes that the postgraduate sector on the whole will remain constant at about 50,000.

Integration is becoming Ulster's key educational issue

Bishop insists on RC schools

Integrated schooling has replaced, at least temporarily, the great debate on comprehensive reorganization as the biggest educational issue in Northern Ireland.

On Easter Sunday, Dr Edward Daly, Bishop of Derry, who is regarded as one of the most progressive members of the Roman Catholic hierarchy, strongly defended Catholic schools. These, he claimed, were a convenient scapegoat for those who were unwilling to face up to the real problems in the community.

It was an insult to the Catholic Church and to generations of Catholic teachers to say that children in their schools were taught to hate anyone. Nor were such schools a factor in keeping people apart. The real cause of division was the centuries of injustice inflicted on one section of the community because it refused to surrender its religious beliefs.

Dr Daly said later that he "insisted on the right of Catholics to have their own schools if they wished to have them and my intimation at the moment is that they do wish to have them. I would wish to have them myself".

However, doubt has been thrown on Dr Daly's claim by the publication of a survey which says that 88 per cent of male Catholics of working age favour integration. The survey, which was funded by the Social Science Research Council and carried out under the direction of Professors Jackson, Iutaka and Hutchinson, was part of a large scale random sample to investigate social mobility.

A total of 1,510 Protestant and 841 Catholic males of working age throughout Northern Ireland replied to the question: "If a Catholic school and a Protestant school in this area decided to get together now and make a joint school for both religions, I would like my children to go to it."

Threequarters of Catholics and 62 per cent of Protestants agreed "very much" with the statement. A further 13 per cent of Catholics and 15 per cent of Protestants agreed, though not strongly.

Only 8 per cent of Catholics and 17 per cent of Protestants disagreed. The remainder were undecided.

Large majorities in favour of integration have been achieved in several polls during the past 10 years, but most of these have been newspaper readership votes or quota samples. Supporters of integration argue that this latest study is more reliable because it is a random sample and because it is only part of a large survey. The researchers had no personal axes to grind.

Nor do the political leaders in Derry share the bishop's views. Last month the predominantly Catholic Derry City Council, one of Northern Ireland's 26 local authorities, voted by 20-1 in favour of mixed schools; only a loyalist councillor voted against.

The annual conference of the Alliance Party in Belfast last weekend reaffirmed the party's commitment to integration with only one abstention. Mr Denis Loretto, the chairman, said this policy was not an attack on the church hierarchy.

"We simply want to see our children educated side by side, whatever their religious background, and we think that moves towards this would inevitably help rather than hinder the resolution of our deep-seated community divisions."

Only a week earlier, the Northern Ireland Labour Party expressed a similar view. Its chairman, Mr George Chambers, argued that segregated schools could only produce another generation of "polarized adults". Children were leaving school without any contact with children of other religions.

Dr Eames, Church of Ireland Bishop of Derry and Raphoe, said his church did not see integration in terms of the imposition of a system by government legislation. "We have never denied the rights of any church to have its own school. But we believe there is every opportunity and advantage to be had from a sincere and informed examination of how far separated schools have contributed to our problems."

In his presidential address to the annual conference of the Ulster Teachers' Union last week, Mr David Riley said Dr Daly's remarks had left the union with "a deep sense of sadness".

Mr John Borrell, head of the integrated Fivemiletown High School, co Tyrone, said the power-sharing executive in 1974 had grasped the nettle of shared schools. "Since then we have been under the dead leadership of a succession of direct rule English politicians who have had the effrontery to exclude integration from their proposals for secondary education."

Mr Borrell, whose motion in favour of a government working party on integration was carried, claimed that the Department of Education's consultative document on the reorganization of secondary education was merely "a tribal head count".

All Children Together, the organization formed to promote shared schools, also rejected "further consolidation or extension of the present segregated system" and claimed that the consultative document would "destroy the hopeful amount of integration actually taking place".

In a submission to the Minister for Education, ACT argues that while segregation is not the cause of Northern Ireland's problems, "we feel it will be impossible for this community to solve these problems without introducing integrated education."

Tawse or strap. Effective deterrent, say children.

Two out of three Scots pupils favour the strap

Two out of three secondary school pupils in Scotland believe that teachers should be allowed to use the strap, say the Educational Institute of Scotland. They base this figure on a survey commissioned from the Scottish Council for Research in Education preparatory to a review of EIS policy on corporal punishment.

A questionnaire covering a wide range of school rules and sanctions was put to a random sample of children in 40 schools between mid-May and late June 1976. The survey covering 1,049 pupils, comprising 554 boys and 495 girls.

When asked whether they thought the class teacher should be allowed to use the strap as a form of punishment 67 per cent of the pupils said yes. There were significant differences between year groups but no consistent pattern to the differences.

The main reasons given by pupils for supporting the use of the strap were: that it was needed for misbehaviour, that teachers in the classroom needed it for control; and that it was an effective deterrent. Those opposed to the use of the strap generally claimed that it was ineffective or that corporal punishment of children was wrong.

The strap was said to be the commonest form of punishment now in use in Scotland for serious offences. But there were two exceptions.

In the case of stealing only 36 per cent of the sample reported that the belt was the norm of punishment. Expulsion quoted by 18 per cent and re ing to the police by 13 per cen

The other exception to the ge rule was the punishment giv someone who was lazy and di work in class. Here the comm form of punishment was said t extra homework (43 per cent) lowed by lines (21 per cent) then the strap (13 per cent).

In general, school rules acceptable to the majority. Ex tions were school rules on dress personal appearance where 54 cent found the rules too se (interestingly, with little differ between boys and girls, the re comments) and only 35 per c found them acceptable.

The overall proportion of pu punished in one way or another the fortnight studied was 45 p cent, but the figures for the yo ger children and boys were high

Only 15 per cent of the bo compared with 45 per cent of t girls, thought that the sexes we treated alike for punishment, t prevalent impression being th girls were treated more lenient and either not strapped or strapp less often or punished less severe in general.

The children were also ask whether they had ever bee strapped at primary school: 43 p cent of the girls and 16 per ce of the boys reported that they ha not been, while 24 per cent. sa they had been strapped quite ofte

PERSONAL COLUMN

I'll fight to save Kojak

I want to put the case for Starsky and Hutch, Kojak, The Sweeney and others of the genre. They hardly need my defence. Their popularity is assured. Yet they are all the subject of continuous sniping from those who claim to be concerned about the amount of violence on television. Most recently, the Annan committee has fired some rather heavier calibre criticism at the same target.

The criticism goes something like this. There are too many violent incidents in these programmes. Millions of young people watch them and will be encouraged to imitate the violence they have seen. This helps to account for the increasing violence of our society. It follows that if we reduce the incidence of violence in such programmes as Starsky and Hutch, we will reduce the violence of society.

I do not know that we shall ever discover the connexion between the violent act on the television screen and the violent act which is for real. Television imposes on the viewer such absolute passivity it is difficult to imagine that it could inspire any activity at all, let alone violent activity.

Indeed it seems more logical to argue that the institution of television—regardless of what is being shown—produces in society a state of inertia and a mood of placid acceptance that is much more insidious than violence. Television is the opium of the people. It is a bland sedative calculated to make a Godless existence just bearable.

Shut down the television stations and people might start asking questions about the meaning and purpose of their lives. Heaven forbid. But this is an aspect of television that does not appear to worry the critics of Kojak and Co. They are so bothered about the bad example set before children by the rough-house methods of the undercover cops, they have no time to notice the anaesthetizing effect that television has on society as a whole.

Are these television shows excessively violent? That is not my impression. (Yes, I watch them whenever I can. I suffer from numerous hang-ups but not from that neo-puritan guilt complex that compels some of my friends to watch "The life cycle of the Lesser Spotted Perching Bird" when they could be relaxing with the villains of the 22nd precinct.)

There is violence, of course, but with very few exceptions it is the minimum violence necessary to trigger the story or bring the villains to book. What is more important, the context in which the violence occurs is morally impeccable. Good triumphs over evil. But the goodies are neither prim nor pious; they do their job without hypocrisy but with obvious professionalism.

Their moralizing—if it occurs at all—is succinct, direct and characterized by a sort of blunt humanity. George Steiner once told me that he regarded Kojak as a genius in the use of language and I can see what he meant; the dialogue has a vibrance and freshness that makes you feel you are hearing the language for the first time.

I would make even higher claims for these programmes. They give their audience a deeper, more accurate insight into the human condition than a whole season of religious programmes and certainly than most of the plays we are offered. Take the long Kojak film shown before Easter.

For an hour and a half we followed him as he sorted out a number of different cases which reflected a cross section of human villainy, stupidity and despair. He clobbered the villains. He rebuked the pharisaical. He refused to trust a young man who clearly did not deserve trust. He prevented a distraught wife from taking her own life. He sent an amateur prostitute back to her husband and children. "Go and sin no more." He did pass judgment.

In every word and action he co veyed an acute awareness human limitation, including own. Yet to those who seemed the edge of surrender he co selled fortitude. Life can be— often is—bloody but there is in our will to endure, to make best of what we have.

As I watched, I was reminded nothing so much as of the Gosp Kojak is no Christ but I susp that in his attitudes to hum frailty he is closer to the Christ the Gospels than the safe, resp table figure of Zeffirelli's extra ganza. For all Kojak's sharp clot and talk, for all his implacable h tility to the monsters of the und world, his life style is essenti Christian. I would rather my c dren had him as their hero th some of the hypocritical wind who pass for Christian spokesm Starsky and Hutch are not haps in the same league tho why anyone should accuse them unnecessary violence is beyond A nicer, gentler, more hum couple would be hard to imag Their problem is not that they too violent but that they are al too decent to carry conviction.

The Sweeney are something ferent again. They cut corn treat villains as villains, and not much given to the kid-gl approach. How far they reflect attitudes of the Flying Squad I not know, nor do I think it m ters. They fight crime, which is such an anti-social activity as of their critics seem to th When there is no other way meet anarchic violence with lence, a formula that may ja intellectual sensibilities but which civilization has had enough to be grateful.

It will be clear by now th have little sympathy with who condemn these particular grammes on the charge of viol If we ever have a reductio television time—whether imp by a three-day week or for higher motive—I will defend retention of these programme the grounds of their moral cont

Banish current affairs, culture, banish the Lesser Sp Perching Bird, but do not Kojak. He is one of the few we have to the confusion time.

MP calls for inquiry into violence at 'tough school' iolence has precipitated an inquiry affairs at Sladebrook Compre- hensive School, North London, where there have been allegations of a number of attacks on teachers by pupils in recent months. The case was raised in parliament on Tuesday (page 6).

The story has come to light in a dossier of events compiled at the school and passed to Dr Rhodes Boyson, the local MP, who represents Brent North. The report alleges that the deputy head teacher was punched when trying to stop a fight between two girls, that two teachers had to struggle with a distraught girl wielding a knife, that other teachers had been punched, kicked and knocked down, and that others were injured in various ways.

Dr Boyson, who is a Conservative party spokesman on educational affairs, has called for a public inquiry but Mr Leslie Ford, chairman of the board of governors, has dismissed the claims of violence as nothing unusual.

He admitted that Sladebrook was a tough school and that there had been a number of incidents, "but", he added, "it is no worse than many others. Every school has its trouble-makers and Sladebrook is no exception". He said the blame for incidents of this kind lay not with the head teacher and his staff; it was the fault of the parents.

Mr Max Morris, headmaster of a nearby comprehensive school, said the case was a tragedy for the school, the staff and the children. "It is one of the most difficult multi ethnic areas in the country", he said, "but it is not typical of the schools in the area."

Sladebrook is a large comprehensive school with 1,250 pupils and, according to Mr Morris "one of the schools worst hit in the period of severe shortage in most London schools before 1975". Dr Boyson commented: "It is true that this is an exceptionally difficult school but that is no excuse for failure."

Drawbridges down for a day

More than 200 of Britain's historic houses, castles and gardens are holding a special open day for teachers on April 30 as part of Heritage Education Year.

Mr John Hodgson, director of Heritage Education Year, said this week that owners of historic houses and stately homes were extremely keen for their properties to be used for educational work. But they had little idea what schools wanted.

"The Open Day has been devised to allow interested teachers to see what resources are available and then to sit down with the owner or administrator to discuss how they might best be used and what forms of educational material might be produced."

The buildings open to teachers range from well-known publicly owned ones like the Tower of London to private stately homes such as Breamore House, Fordingbridge, Hampshire. Teachers are asked to contact owners no later than Saturday, April 23.

L.e.a.s rapped over parents' complaints

Two local authorities have been given mild rebukes by the local government Ombudsman after parents had complained about maladministration.

Tameside council took too long to reply to a parent who had applied for a place at a direct-grant school, the Ombudsman has decided. Five months elapsed before the parent was told that there would be no grant available.

Leeds City Council did not give advance notice to parents in an outlying village about what the transport arrangements would be for their children to get to school. Five allegations against Rochdale Council about the allocation of primary school places were not proved, the Ombudsman said. Parents had complained of bias, arbitrary zoning and delay.

Swop jobs to make more jobs, say NUT

The National Union of Teachers has produced its own proposal for "jobswopping" to relieve unemployment among young teachers. The union is suggesting that older teachers be seconded from schools to work in government schemes for jobless school leavers so that newly qualified teachers can be taken on instead.

The proposal was outlined by executive members and officials of the union to a subcommittee of the Commons Select Committee on Expenditure which is inquiring into the progress of the job creation programme. The union representatives urged that more attention be paid to education and training for the young people taking part in the projects, 77 per cent of which offered none, they said. Although they welcomed the creation of temporary non-teaching jobs in the programme for young teachers who would otherwise be without work, they were strongly opposed to their use in instructing other young people in the programme.

Mr Jack Chambers, a member of the executive who is a Southampton secondary head told the MPs that there was evidence that the young teachers who were instructing in the job creation programme were coming into contact with some very difficult young people. The contact could be "socially damaging" for youngsters and teachers.

Mr Chambers said: "Teachers who are unemployed after having been trained for three or four years feel that they have failed. When they are put into the job creation programme or other alternative employment schemes it gives rise to bitterness which leads to political stances which are reflected in their attitudes to the youngsters they are supposed to help.

"It would be much better to have these qualified jobless teachers going into the schools, and to release older qualified teachers of the right kind who are the most suitable to do this sort of work."

Afterwards Mr Chambers made it plain that he was worried about the politics of some young teachers whom he said might have come under the influence of Trotskyist groups during their training.

OU move towards more outside assessors

Purge on courses after allegations of Marxist bias

by Sue Reid

A full review of the Open University's academic standards and course production techniques is to be underaken following allegations that one of its major courses shows a Marxist bias.

The review, ordered by the senate earlier this month, comes in the wake of a detailed investigation by the university's influential academic advisory committee into the allegations. It is expected to lead to the compulsory use of external assessors for all courses.

Under fire is the university's new course "Schooling in Society". In an article published in The Times Educational Supplement in February, Professor Julius Gould, of Nottingham University, claimed that this programme, particularly its initial unit "Schooling and Capitalism", showed a Marxist slant.

Professor Gould alleged that the course was a disservice to the university and its students, remarks that led to heated protest from its authors but were endorsed elsewhere.

The issue was referred to the academic advisory committee, made up of external academics and Sir Walter Perry, the university's vice-chancellor. The committee maintained that any judgment of the "Schooling in Society" course would be premature until its final units were completed. As yet only two of the programme's six "blocks" are in use.

But the committee recommended a wider use of external assessment as a method of safeguarding the university's academic freedom and public standing when "contentious" course materials were at issue.

The university's academic board, in response to the recommendations, argued that there was a case for undertaking a review of the "existing mechanism for maintaining academic standards". The review, to be carried out by the academic board, will consider the call for a compulsory external assessment.

In the last year Open University courses have been criticized as politically biased on more than one occasion. Last May Mrs Caroline Cox, of the North London Polytechnic alleged that a third-level course "Patterns of Inequality" provided a platform for "blatantly political" views.

A subsequent article in The Times by Mr Hugh Freeman, a consultant psychiatrist with academic connections at Salford and Manchester universities criticized two of the university's course books "Language and Social Reality" and "Politics, Work and Occuption 1" as having a Marxist bias.

The university maintains that Professor Gould's allegations "precipitated" the academic advisory committee's investigations but there has been growing concern about criticism of the political bias of course material for some time.

Mr Ray Wolfe, a member of the "Schooling in Society" course team said this week that he welcomed the review but condemned the blanket use of course assessors.

He added: "Now the course is in the public eye I do not see why a review should not be successful in clearing the air." Any judgment of the course at this early stage would be premature. When the whole course had appeared it would be seen to be balanced, he claimed.

● The Open University's recurrent grant for the current year will be £26.8m, the Department of Education and Science announced this week. The university's estimated expenditure last year was £24m.

Long delays in allocating the grant, expected last December, were caused by changes in the methods of its assessment. This is the first time the grant has been assessed on a cash limit basis with a built-in sum to allow for inflation.—THES.

Ulster decision on all-ins soon

Lord Melchett, the Minister for Education in Northern Ireland, has promised a statement in "weeks rather than months" on the vexed question of comprehensive education. The statement will mark the culmination of nine months of intensive discussion following the publication last July of a Department of Education consultative document on reorganization.

The minister who was addressing the annual conference of the Ulster Teachers' Union in Newcastle, County Down, gave no indication of what his decision would be, but he made clear that the system of parallel 11-16 and 11-18 schools proposed in the document was now a doubtful starter.

"There is undoubtedly a great deal of unease about the idea of 11-16 schools operating alongside 11-18 schools", he told the delegates. "Your own union expressed the fear that this would be an unsatisfactory mixture, and this view has been shared by many of those who have commented."

Lord Melchett devoted much of his speech to truancy, including criticism of the UTU's policy on the matter. To some extent he said truancy showed that schools were not meeting children's needs. "One way of doing this is to see if the curriculum is relevant to the pupil's background and future prospects as well as to his or her age and ability. I am convinced that we still need more emphasis on explaining, demonstrating and actually increasing the extent to which school work relates to the life of the community in which the pupil actually lives", he said.

For those pupils who fell through the safety net, the minister advocated a more individual approach: "I hope by giving persistant truants a chance to catch up on work which they have missed and by enabling them to talk about their problems with interested and sympathetic adults, we can help them to re-establish their links with their school.

"I am personally convinced that detaining people in training schools for persistent truancy is no solution and I think this is now widely accepted in Northern Ireland. But we must beware of on the one hand decrying the use of training school orders for truancy and simultaneously demanding special schools where truants would be made to go.

"We have got to look at new non-institutional methods, not at replacing one set of institutions with more of the same simply called by a different name."

HMI eyes on graduate training

Teams of HM Inspectors are to visit all institutions offering postgraduate teaching qualifications.

Mr Robert Clayton, principal of St Martin's College, Lancaster, which runs a postgraduate course for about 160 students, said he understood the HMIs would arrive in teams of 10 and stay for three days. But a DES spokesman this week said the teams would vary in size with the establishment.

Mr I. B. Butterworth, staff inspector in charge of teacher training, said the visits were part of the normal duties of the inspectorate.

For some time teacher organizations have doubted that a year of teacher training was enough. The National Union of Teachers favours the concurrent pattern of course, where academic and professional studies are maintained throughout the four years, but if faced with a consecutive pattern, where the professional component comes at the end, the NUT would like to see this extended to two years.

"When you look at it, the 12 months come down to about five", said Mr Frank Harris, vice-chairman of the NUT Advisory Committee on Higher Education, this week.

Mrs Jean Bocock, assistant secretary for higher education of the National Association of Teachers in Further and Higher Education, said that while it looked as though the consecutive pattern would prevail in Government plans for teacher training in the 1980s, it was NATFHE's view that for most teachers the present one year course was inadequate.

Record cards raise libel fears

Teachers in Bedfordshire may take legal advice on the implications for them of the education authority's decision to open school record cards to inspection by parents. They are concerned that they may be sued for libel if parents object.

The Bedfordshire association of the National Union of Teachers will meet next month to decide what action to take. A spokesman for the county council said a new record card might be introduced later this year.

The Tongues of Men

Professor George Steiner

In a recent programme on BBC 2 Professor George Steiner investigated the enormous diversity of world languages, and the age-old search for a universal tongue.

Ever since the mythical destruction of the Tower of Babel, human speech has been divided into more than 5,000 tongues. The social, political and economic effects have been catastrophic. Now at last there is the prospect of a single universal language – American English – spreading around the world. Yet there is a price to pay, for every time a language dies, so does a bit of humanity.

The full text of George Steiner's absorbing study The Tongues of Men is being published in the 21 and 28 April issues of The Listener.

Sixth forms: no policy change

No decision had been taken on sixth-form colleges, Mrs Shirley Williams, Education Secretary told the House of Commons this week. Discussions had taken place between the Department of Education and Science and l.e.a.s on the ideal size of a sixth form but this was not a statement of policy.

In answer to a question from Mr Nigel Spearing (Newham, South, Lab), she said: "I have issued no guidance on the establishment of sixth form centres. I have mentioned in several speeches the need to use our limited resources effectively for 16 to 18-year-old pupils, especially in the light of the future decline in the school population.

Mr Spearing said that when l.e.a.s had a choice of creating sixth-form centres or 11 to 18 schools, the latter were set up with the express approval of the Department and the minister's predecessors. This review, coming out of the blue, was typical of the worst aspects of the Department which sometimes tended to be excessively pessimistic and bureaucratic and created uncertainty in the educational system.

Mrs Williams said she wanted to clear up a misunderstanding. The statement of policy was the one she had made to the National Association of Schoolmasters and other bodies in the past week.

"It was to the effect that as the size of the post-16-year-old age group falls, as it will dramatically by the mid-eighties, they should give thought to what provision can be made to offer a reasonable range of courses for those studying in the sixth-form academic and non-academic courses", she said.

"There are three possibilities: linking of existing all through-schools, the sixth-form college concept and the tertiary college concept. It is for l.e.a.s, in consultation with teachers, to decide what suits them best." Many articles had appeared in newspapers based on misleading misconceptions, she said.

Mr Alan Beith, Liberal spokesman on education (Berwick upon Tweed, L), asked Mrs Williams to make clear that in expressing support for the sixth-form college principle which, in some cases, he shared, she was not inviting local authorities who had just completed major secondary reorganization to embark on a further reorganization in five, eight or 10 years?

Mrs Williams said she was not. The decision was bound to be based on the local pattern of educational provision. I am only trying to tell schools that if they decide that they do not wish to reorganize further, and I appreciate that they may not, they should start considering how provision can be made between groups of schools to be able to offer minority subjects, which might otherwise disappear from the curriculum to any child wishing to take them.

Mr Norman St John-Stevas, chief Opposition spokesman on education (Chelmsford, C), said: "Is she saying she is repudiating as libellous the reports that she is carrying on a vendetta against the traditional sixth form and is prepared to encourage a variety of sixth-form provision in which sixth-form colleges will have a place but in which the traditional sixth form will have an honoured and guaranteed place, too?"

Mrs Williams said that was broadly fair. "Where a school sixth form is so small that it is unable to mount more than a narrow range of courses, academic and non-academic, that sixth form must link with other sixth forms to enable minority subjects to be offered", she said.

"We have great concern about subjects like Italian, Russian and Spanish which may well disappear unless arrangements can be made in local authority areas to enable all boys and girls to take them though they may be offered by only a single school.

She said that something like one third of boys and girls would choose to stay on in the sixth form after 16, as against the one quarter now. But quite a number of youngsters decided to move to further education colleges because they wanted more vocational training.

Disgrace to send children to Sladebrook—Boyson

Conditions at Sladebrook comprehensive school in North London were brought up during some sharp exchanges in the Commons on Tuesday about standards of discipline in primary and secondary schools.

Mr Rhodes Boyson, an Opposition spokesman on education (Brent, North, C) commented that if half the things said in a dossier on this school were true it was a disgrace that any children had to go there and that teachers had to teach there.

Miss Margaret Jackson, Under Secretary for Education and Science, said she would be glad if Laurence Pavitt: his constituency.

Mr Boyson would send copies of this "anonymous document" to the Department. She thought there was a strong possibility that perhaps less than half of the document was true.

Miss Janet Fookes (Plymouth, Drake, C) had raised the issue of standards of discipline, commenting that most teachers found it more difficult to keep order now than they had ever done. In some schools the classroom more nearly resembled a battlefield. What practical steps did the DES intend to take?

Miss Jackson said she doubted whether any minister had ever been wholly satisfied about standards of discipline. She did not underrate the serious difficulties which could be caused in particular schools by a tiny minority but she did not believe these problems were widespread.

She said teachers accepted their professional responsibility to maintain order and discipline and the DES had held discussions with them and the l.e.a.s about what could be done to help.

She did not accept that most teachers were finding things more difficult but she did accept that some were. As for practical steps, the fact that these difficulties, such as they were, were arising in the classroom meant they could only be solved in the classroom.

She added: "We are trying to find out what practices local authorities and schools are using which are most helpful and to make sure they are more widespread."

Mr Laurence Pavitt (Brent, South, Lab) pointed out that Sladebrook school was in his constituency. The school was in an inner city area with not only educational but housing, employment and many other problems. "It does a disservice to the teachers, the headmaster who was only appointed three years ago, and many of the parents who are trying to make Sladebrook a school to be proud of, when Mr Boyson makes publicity of the kind he has done", added Mr Pavitt.

Miss Jackson replied that it was frequently unhelpful to parents, teachers and children facing enormous problems of this kind, if people sought not to help but merely to use it for their own advantage. A lot of what had been said about Sladebrook was not only inaccurate but singularly unhelpful.

Mr Rhodes Boyson declared that he did not make any statement on Sladebrook despite the dossier in his hands showing that 40 out of 52 children in the second year did not know how many days there were in a year and only one out of the 52 knew how many yards there were in a mile.

He did not make any statement until the Brent director of education agreed that seven out of the nine attacks on teachers in the last three months, two of whom required medical attention, were actually known to the local authority; and until the chairman of the governing body said that when things went wrong in that school it was awful. Only then did he ask for a public inquiry.

All-in plans still awaited

None of the l.e.a.s who got Government reminders to submit plans for comprehensive reorganization have put in their proposals yet.

Miss Jackson said in a Commons reply that no proposals had been received from any authority (or from the governors of any voluntary school) which had been written to requiring them to submit proposals within six months to complete secondary reorganization in their areas.

The Secretary of State wrote to eight l.e.a.s on November 24, 1976, a further 26 on January 17 this year.

'Weaknesses' in language teaching

The Inspectorate's survey of 83 comprehensive schools indicated some weaknesses in the teaching of modern languages, Miss Jackson told the House. She added: "I hope its findings and recommendations will encourage l.e.a.s and others concerned with language teaching to consider how improvements may be effected within the resources currently available."

Miss Jackson was replying to Mr Michael Neubert (Havering, Romford, C) who said that for a country dependent on world trade it was alarming that only one comprehensive pupil out of 10 had a language O level.

Mr Rhodes Boyson (Brent, North, C), an Opposition spokesman, said many language teachers considered that one reason for the mediocrity of teaching, brought out in the report, was that English grammar was no longer taught in certain schools. A foreign language teacher had to spend a lot of time on teaching grammar before getting on to the language. It would help if all primary and secondary schools were required to do basic study of grammar.

Miss Jackson said maybe inadequate study of grammar was a factor. There was a shortage of teachers and the report showed up the lack of proper planning of language studies.

● The DES is discussing urgently with the Business Education Council the possibility of combining foreign languages with studies of engineering and technology. This would mean a new generation of businessmen perhaps better equipped than the present one, Mrs Williams said.

Mr Roderick MacFarquhar (Belper, Lab) said it was regrettable that the DES seemed to have no information on the numbers of courses available to businessmen who might wish to acquire a foreign language. Mrs Williams pointed out that most of these courses were full-cost courses which were not run by the education department.

During questions about strengthening the links between industry and higher and further education, Mrs Williams said there were already five pilot schemes linking universities with associated firms and another three universities would shortly announce proposals.

Mr Gordon Oakes, Minister of State, in other exchanges, said the Schools Council, in cooperation with the TUC and CBI, were mounting a project to provide materials for schools and colleges dealing with the structure of industry.

Art teachers redraw the lines

A return to structured art teaching for pupils aged seven to 18 and a radical re-appraisal of art education in teacher training are demanded in a "black paper" presented by the National Society for Art Education, to its annual conference in Matlock, Derbyshire, last week.

The society—the organization for teachers of art and design—says that the artistic abilities of children in primary schools are being underestimated. "Adulation of what is truly delightful about child art has been a block to real thinking about the curriculum". Art is as important for human development as literacy and numeracy. It urges a redefinition of objectives, particularly in secondary schools where art and design "is often under-valued".

The society also fears that art will be a loser as a free option subject in comprehensive schools.

The "black paper" accuses examination boards of indifference to art and says that examinations for art, craft and design have been distorted by an unsympathetic, university oriented system. Provision of in-service training is biased against teachers of art, who are losing status. The needs of art education are under-researched.

In an attack on mounting administrative pressures the president, Mr Leonard Stoppani, said that "far too many of our senior teaching staff are being tamed and neutralized by administrative and committee burdens that are out of all proportion to what their institutions should be about".

The technical standards of art work produced in recent years had risen but the work itself was becoming standardized. "Fine art seems to have exhausted its traditions but has not found new directions or any new means of expression. Current educational trends have led to a contemporary academicism which sometimes lacks even basic competence.

"This last spurt to preserve an old-fashioned concept of the avant-garde artist is degenerating into pure eclecticism and often into self-indulgent trivialities shakily propped up by quasi-intellectual theory. If credibility in this area of visual leadership is lost, the outlook will be bleak."

The arts were essential to civilized survival, along with science and technology. Teachers should defend art education against the dismantling of proven systems of worth in efforts to achieve economies.

Professor Brian Allison, of Leicester Polytechnic, said the status of art education was weak and getting weaker. "Art education is considered as a fill subject by administrators, heads, pupils and parents, while the teachers rarely question whether what they are doing is either relevant or to the point".

For the lack of progress in art education he blamed the teachers themselves. "Too many see themselves as amateur artists instead of as professional art teachers.

"Most art teachers may say they are not training the children to be artists, but the major part of their activity is organized as if they were. Teachers who see themselves primarily as artists tend to feel that they have to be original all the time."

Part of the trouble lay with the teacher training colleges, which were trying to behave as quasi art schools instead of as trainers of those who had to develop the visual sensibilities of future citizens. "It is clear that the development of such educated sensibilities does not occur solely as a result of having painted or printed a few pictures, having made a few junk sculptures or designed a dog-walking machine."

The Schools Council's art and craft education project for the eight to 13s was a good example of the backward-looking but traditional and prevalent view of art in schools. It was concerned over much with making and not enough with the development of visual discrimination, critical analysis and appraisal or an understanding of the historical context of the art encountered.

Art education had to accept some responsibility for the link between school and the man made environment. "People on town councils, if under 35, have all had nine years of art education. All who have responsibility for our surroundings have had some art education and that education has manifestly failed where those surroundings are unsatisfactory and where the public accepts unsatisfactory surroundings without complaint."

Urging art teachers to become involved in the debate about education, he said: "Development will come from local authorities where the art teachers get together to decide where they are going."

Mr Dan Shannon, of HM Inspectorate, suggested that art teachers should make closer links with those responsible for creating the man-made environment. "I want to see more art teachers involved with groups concerned with the environment. A lot of it is dirty work, but it is of supreme relevance to the quality of life. That is where the artist should be—in the middle of the fight, not on the periphery".

Mr George Williams, secretary of NSAE, said it was as unreasonable to blame art teachers for the man-made environment as it was to blame school chemistry for the pollution of rivers. "Nor can I see that it is the responsibility of art education to put it right, although I wish it would."

Mr Ian Simpson, principal of St Martin's School of Art, London, suggested a look at the way things were done in Scottish art education. "I have a feeling that they are much better at it than we are. They are commonly regarded as unfashionable and traditional, but, privately, people who have seen their work will admit that it is better than any that may be found in England."

He also put in a plea for the opening up of art education for the benefit of people who wanted to learn but were unable to do so full-time. "Sooner or later we are going to have to open our premises for perhaps 48 weeks of every year. Financial pressures will force it. This could mean that people who are now excluded could move more freely into and out of art education."

Failure of schooling for the deaf

by Diane Spencer

Fifty per cent of deaf children leave school unable to speak intelligibly, lip read effectively, or read beyond the level of a 10-year-old.

These depressing findings are revealed in a report published by the National Deaf Children's Society this week to highlight National Deaf Children's Week.

The plight of the profoundly deaf (those with a hearing loss of more than 85 decibels) is even worse. According to Dr R. Conrad, of Oxford University, half of them lip read worse than the average hearing child, untrained and inexperienced; 70 per cent have speech which is difficult to understand; only 10 per cent can speak intelligibly and half have a reading age of less than seven years.

Dr Conrad has just completed pioneering research to evaluate the communication skills of deaf school leavers. He investigated 360 children who left in 1975-76, and out of the entire sample, found only six with a reading age corresponding to their chronological age. Almost half had not reached a reading age of nine.

His research reflects that of the NDCS which did its own membership survey mainly on employment problems faced by deaf school leavers. Both pieces of research appear in this week's report. Seventy-seven per cent of NDCS members said they were dissatisfied with the speech of the profoundly deaf.

The society also found depressingly little careers help for the deaf. Only 23 per cent go on to do further education; 85 per cent leave at 16; 74 per cent had difficulties with interviews and interviewers were often unaware of the problems of deafness. Schools did little to prepare children for life outside school and gave them almost no vocational training.

You can scarcely exaggerate the impact and value of BI Educational Cruises. History, geography, current affairs, arts and sciences are brought vividly to life. Vividly and incomparably.

On board the 17,000 ton BI school ship UGANDA, student parties occupy dormitories. Parents and teachers can be assured of the continuous vigilance of the ship's personnel over the young passengers' welfare. Much less falls on teachers' shoulders than on other organised educational journeys.

A BI Educational Cruise offers a double advantage in that the days at sea are planned to educate the students in various ways – social, in the sharing of communal life, work and pastimes, illustrated lectures, the life and direction of the ship itself. They are an integral part of the whole educational experience. The testimony of teachers is that a BI Educational Cruise broadens young minds and deepens their understanding of everything they see and learn.

Teachers travel free, in a ratio of one teacher for every 15 pupils, occupy comfortable separate cabins, and share the dining room, music room, lounge, pool and bars with some 200 other cruise passengers. Teachers' husbands or wives can travel at attractive fares.

NAS–UWT conference, Torquay

Reports by Bert Lodge

Pledge to close secret files on fellow staff

NAS/UWT members will no longer write reports on colleagues without showing them to the people concerned. The conference decided to accept this as an amendment to a motion on confidentiality after they had heard Mr Jeff Brinley, Huddersfield, say that when he became a head 10 years ago he resolved never to write a confidential report on colleagues or on students on teaching practice.

"An honest document is bound to contain some adverse comment", said Mr Brinley. "If it doesn't, you are being unkind to the person you are writing about. But if you are not prepared to show it to the person concerned, you have no right to write it in the first place."

Delegates accepted the amendment after it had been pointed out that this would be a start towards the goal embodied in the main motion—that teachers should be shown any document concerning their professional competence.

About 4,000 members of the union are heads and many more are heads of department. Acceptance of the motion means, therefore, that the convention of confidentiality will now be disregarded in many areas.

Proposing the main motion, Mr Edwin Chandley, Coventry, said there was a suspicion among teachers that in every education office there were dossiers on them containing statements impossible to check for authenticity and the sources of which were impossible to trace.

In addition, he said, teachers needed to know what their professional faults were in order to improve themselves.

"Unfortunately, there is an element of cowardice here. There is a suspicion that future relationships will be soured if a teacher is shown open and frank comments on his personality and abilities. So while they remain ignorant, reports on them crystallize and fossilize in filing cabinets."

The motion was carried.

Minister wants to enlist better recruits

Recommendations that entrants to teacher training should have at least O levels in mathematics and English will be included in the Green Paper on educational guidelines which is due out in June, Mrs Shirley Williams, Education Secretary, told a Torquay press conference.

Earlier she forecast a reorganization of sixth-form education to make the best use of resources. And, she said it would probably be necessary to earmark some rate support grant money for specific purposes.

She condemned the excessive amount of violence on television, including the news, and said parents and teachers had obligations towards children which both must respect.

Mrs Williams told NAS/UWT delegates that it was reasonable to demand higher standards from entrants to teaching now that the intake had had to be reduced because of a falling school population. "It would not be unreasonable to ask for O levels in mathematics and English. In my opinion there would be substantial support for this."

But the training would be insufficient if it was not supported by opportunities for in-service training. She was disappointed at local authorities which had diverted money intended for this to other uses.

"I have come to the reluctant conclusion that we have to move towards some element of specific grant in the rate support grant settlement."

Afterwards, she mentioned nursery education in poor areas, help for language teaching to immigrant children and in-service training as likely to be specified in the next settlement. Once in-service training schemes were working the necessary replacement of teachers rotating through the system would relieve the unemployment problem.

Relief would also come from easing the conditions for early retirement and from the year-long courses being mounted to retrain unemployed teachers in shortage subjects such as mathematics and handicrafts.

Mrs Williams: "higher standards"

A contracting younger population would be required to make provision for an expanding older one. Today's school population of nine million would be down to 7.5 million by 1986. She would like to see more pupils staying on after 16, ideally about 32 per cent by 1990 instead of the present 25 per cent.

But many sixth forms were wasteful of resources. The average pupil-teacher ratio was 10 : 1 almost as luxurious as the higher education ratio of 9 : 1. In 60 per cent of sixth-form modern language classes there were fewer than five pupils. Many l.e.a.s had sixth forms of fewer than 50. We could not afford such an uneconomic use of resources.

"I am not saying we should all move towards sixth-form colleges nor to tertiary colleges", she said. In some parts of the country a co-operative pattern, where schools shared out minority subjects, was emerging.

While not being in favour of censorship, Mrs Williams said she was worried about the excessive amount of violence on television, including the news. Afterwards, she said she had already had informal talks with the BBC and the ITV on the matter.

Beware FE takeover—warning

Mr John Atherfold, a Doncaster comprehensive head, warned delegates against the growing influence of the National Association of Teachers in Further and Higher Education at the Department of Education and Science.

Moves to take the education of the 16-19 age group out of schools, he said, were orchestrated by the DES and NATFHE

Mr Atherfold, who was supporting a motion by Mr Nelson Burkinshaw, also of Doncaster, that responsibility for the education of the group should remain with the schools and in the hands of qualified teachers, said there was some place for sixth-form education within the FE system, but general education did not belong there.

Mr Burkinshaw said the effect of the proposed transfer would be the end of sixth forms in schools, a reduction of unit totals, fewer scale posts, restricted career opportunities and a loss of highly qualified and experienced teachers "whose experience is useful down the school as well as up".

Members of the NAS/UWT would find themselves in competition with college lecturers displaced by college closures.

Narrow defeat for early leaving plan

By 363 votes to 285 the conference defeated a motion which would have allowed some pupils to leave school at 15—but with the proviso they could return to full-time education later and use the time up to 16 still owing to them.

Mr David Crane, Hillingdon, who proposed the motion, said it was a bad law that did not take account of individual cases. The present school-leaving regulations did not do so. There was a small but vociferous minority for whom the fabric of the school itself was a problem. For them to stay on for the final year did them no good and the school no good.

Opposing it, Mr Dai Davies, of the executive, said he looked at the motion from the position of a trade unionist first and an educationist second. If it was passed it would mean more unemployment for teachers when there were already 20,000 unemployed. The conference had shown that although it was concerned about disruptive pupils, it did not want them put outside the school system, but only to be separated.

Miss Sheila Jones (Merseyside) said the purpose of education had more to it than simple basic literacy and numeracy. The NAS/UWT was a body of professional people who should be looking for an educational solution to the problem. It would probably be found in a revision of courses for final year pupils.

'Realistic' stance on college cuts

A successful motion which recognized the necessity for reducing teacher training and welcomed the opportunity this provided for a re-examination of training, was moved by Mr Nigel de Gruchy, executive member.

He said the NAS/UWT was the only body on the Government's advisory committee on teacher training (ACSTT), prepared to adopt a realistic stance. "One union appears prepared to train thousands in order to keep themselves in jobs", he remarked.

Miss Diana Boyd, a 32-year-old London primary teacher, wondered what went on in teacher training colleges when she looked at students in action in the classroom. "These strange scholars, with their strange dress and methods, saying what they will and won't do. They give staff more work than the class itself."

Miss Boyd said she did not blame the students. "I blame the college of education lecturers, many of whom have only taught for a short time. They should be put back in the classrooms for a refresher course", she said to applause.

BE A REAL MUSICIAN

Be a Real Musician, together with its companion volume Be a Better Musician, at last fills the need for carefully planned, well-written material that is compatible with Kodály Method teaching at primary level. Music games combined with the structured learning of music skills form the basis of these two new illustrated music books, both of which will be enthusiastically welcomed by the countless teachers who are in need of the right material for this particular stage.

The games featured in 'Be a Real Musician' help gradually build genuine literacy skills; these are subsequently extended to eventually include the playing of both tuned percussion and recorder in 'Be a Better Musician'. The idea is to enable children to 'think the music' as easily as they think in words.

The name Geoffry Russell-Smith is synonymous with that of the Kodály Method; his knowledge and experience lend a special authenticity to his 'conversions' of Kodály's folk-derived training methods for the very different musical heritage of our own children.

Here we have books for British children using Nursery rhymes and singing games that will be familiar to us all.

The teachers' notes at the end of each volume provide a key to the various ways of incorporating work from outside sources, while directly relating the resulting activities to the child's conceptual and performing skills at the stage concerned. These notes will help bring to life the basis of the Method by giving a step-by-step programme of the work, the reasons behind it and ways of expanding it. As in all good music teaching, the end product of every new idea or exercise is music-making — the only way through which a child can achieve musical understanding.

We are sure that these books will prove a delight to all childen and a key to the joys of music for all their lives.

Be a Real Musician by Geoffry Russell-Smith is now available, Price: 80p. Be a Better Musician is in preparation.

Welfare officers

New threat to jobs and status

The Education Welfare Officers' National Association is dead; long live the National Association for Social Workers in Education.

The new name was formally ratified at the conference on the strength of a resolution passed last year. The association ratified a decision also taken last year to merge under the new name with the National Association of Chief Education Welfare Officers.

The final word rests with the chief officers, who hold their annual conference next month.

The new title reflects the association's feeling that its members' role has altered since the pre-1944 Education Act days of school attendance officers to the wider one of social workers in an educational setting. This change was recognized in the Ralphs report on the training and role of education welfare officers, which was published in 1974 and is now regarded as the blueprint for the development of the service.

However, the service is still not a statutory one. Pay, conditions, career structure and training vary between local authorities. The conference resolved to try to remedy this by calling for a statutory educational social work service.

The delegates were also concerned at a new threat to their status and existence—the appointment of ancillary workers who are taking over some of their duties.

Mr Jack Woodcock from Aldershot, alleged that a part-timer, appointed for two hours a day by a Basingstoke school, collected names of missing children, visited their homes and if they were truanting, brought them back.

Mr Frank Coombes, assistant secretary of the association, said this was essentially a trade union dispute. It had arisen because the l.e.a.s were not supplying an adequate service which satisfied schools and parents.

He condemned this "fire brigade" approach to the problem of truancy. "We should be looking at the causes of truancy and how to attract and keep the child at school".

Mr Bob Patton, from Sheffield, said a local survey had revealed that the greatest problem was not truancy but contrived or condoned non-attendance.

Mrs Williams calls for a contract with parents

A "voluntary contract" between parents and schools, setting out the duties and responsibilities of both was proposed by Mrs Shirley Williams, Education Secretary, at the Education Welfare Officers National Association's annual conference at Sheffield last week.

Schools, she said, should promise to teach a child to the best of their capacity, look after his welfare at school, provide information on staff and curriculum, and report on progress to parents.

Parents should undertake to send children to school reasonably dressed, clean, after having been given a "start the day" meal. They should ensure that children had a reasonable night's sleep.

They would also undertake to support schools in reasonable discipline, recognizing that any complaint should, in the first instance, be taken up with a school. They should be told with whom to take it up.

These undertakings should be incorporated in a document which would be only morally binding. There would be no legal commitment.

"I believe such a mutual acknowledgement of responsibility would involve schools and parents more fully with each other," said Mrs Williams. Many parents did not know what was expected of them and they found it difficult to understand what the schools were trying to do.

It was important that school reports, letters and invitations and official communications should be expressed in reasonably understandable language. Government and local authorities could set a better example.

Mrs Williams said later that the idea of the "voluntary contract" was born out of a feeling that parents meant well but no longer knew what schools expected of them. "If we could spell it out, then we could narrow down problem parents to a smaller number." Many parents of good will did not belong to parent-teacher associations and the schools were not getting through to them.

She hoped the idea would be taken up by local authorities in the same way as had the idea of parental comments on school reports suggested at the Newcastle debate. She could not impose it.

On school meals, Mrs Williams said she did not believe the education service could abandon responsibility for what was for many children the only certain hot meal of the day. She was perturbed by the large number of parents who did not apply for the free meals for which their children were eligible.

The conference responded enthusiastically when she said the cost of school uniforms was beyond the capacity of normal families. Local education authorities, schools and education welfare officers should together establish that uniforms should be simple, hardwearing and easily available. "Parents cannot afford the luxury of expensive blazers."

Even A girls drink–and fight

Teenage drinking can lead to aggressive and violent behaviour, even among A stream girls, said Mrs Joyce Burton, the association's general secretary.

She quoted a pilot study involving [illegible] boys and 160 girls conducted by the Medical Council on Alcoholism in June 1975, which revealed that by the age of 16, 90 per cent of the girls and 98 per cent of the boys were drinking.

She had been surprised to learn that many family doctors did not think to ask children who came to them with headaches or stomach pains if they had had any alcohol. She felt strongly that supermarkets which refused to isolate their alcoholic drinks sections and control the sale of drink to the young should be denied a licence.

The school leaving system has become ridiculous, even in the eyes of the young people the education social work service has to deal with, Mr Jack Woodcock told the conference. He called on the government to make pupils eligible to leave on their 16th birthday.

At present some can leave before this while others must stay on for a further seven months. This frustration led to what Mr Frank Coombes, the assistant secretary, termed "final term school aversion."

Mr Cliff Lorenzelli from Sheffield was worried about the amount of money poor parents were forced to spend on non-essential school activities for which local authorities give no grants, such as outings, holidays and photographs.

He claimed that schools were increasingly being used by manufacturers as commercial outlets in return for free equipment or sponsorship. He said that some firms were using school laboratories to test new equipment, some of which would contravene the Health and Safety at Work Act.

Many of the conference resolutions reflected the association's traditional concern with children's welfare. One called on the government to stop dragging its feet and introduce long promised national regulations for the employment of children.

Another for the umpteenth time, drew attention to the anomolies caused by the arbitrary nature of the discetionary powers allowed l.e.a.s for such things as clothing allowances. Mr Roy Jenkinson from Rotherham urged the government to provide statutory allowances.

Truancy cure: 'get back to smaller school'

Truancy records should be kept on a national basis, said Mr Colin Conway, the new president of the association.

Mr Conway, an educational welfare officer in Liverpool, said the association should be consulted in setting up "proper procedures which would monitor what is happening in the schools and the wastage of talent and opportunity by absence from them.

A researcher in Sheffield who was conducting a three-year survey into the causes of truancy was already predicting that the solution to the problem would lie in a return to smaller schools, distinctive uniforms and the prefect system.

In the last 25 years, said Mr Conway, little had been achieved in the struggle to improve the number of workers in the education welfare service, or the standard and quality of training. In the early 1950s there were 2,500 officers and about three-and a half million children. Today there were 3,000 officers and nine million children in maintained schools.

Spot the difference . . .

Girls in private schools are more likely to catch German measles than their sisters in state schools. Yet fewer than half of them are vaccinated against the disease.

Grammar, secondary modern and comprehensive school girls—apart from having free education—have much greater protection, says a report in a recent issue of the British Medical Journal.

Only 48 per cent of girls in independent schools are vaccinated. This compares with 72 per cent in state schools and 68 per cent in direct grant schools. Independent schools are excluded from the vaccination programme which is run by the school health services.

The findings, says the report, are of particular concern because girls from the professional classes are more susceptible to German measles.

Regional variations—in Scotland 81 per cent are vaccinated compared with 61 per cent of Welsh girls—show that more intensive vaccination campaigns must be launched.

If immunisation is to be effective, it says, nearly every girl should be vaccinated.

'Make all Welsh children bilingual'

Welsh Nationalists want the school leaving age reduced to 15 and all teaching in Welsh schools to be in Welsh. This was decided at a special education conference in Llandrindod, Powys, recently called to draw up an education policy for Plaid Cymru.

The conference rejected a proposal for compulsory education between the ages of four and 16 in favour of five and 15. All state schools should be comprehensive.

Eventually Plaid Cymru wants all teaching to be in Welsh. It wants to encourage an early start to the teaching of Welsh in primary schools to make all Welsh children bilingual.

Widen scope of colleges, says a voice from the DES

The surviving colleges of education should be prepared to mount part-time and further education courses, said Mr David Lloyd Jones, an Under Secretary in the Department of Education and Science, last week. Colleges of education should not regard degree courses as their only proper task.

Mr Lloyd Jones was addressing the annual conference of the 600-member Association of College Registrars and Administrators at Northumberland College of Higher Education—a college which hopes to avoid the threatened closure by offering further education courses in addition to teacher training. Mr Lloyd Jones was not actually present at the conference. Because of a train strike he delivered his speech via a telephone taperecorder and loudspeaker.

By 1981 there would be 414 institutions offering advanced courses, about 40 of them voluntary colleges, he said. There would be 67 colleges with more than 90 per cent advanced work, most of them former colleges of education; 57 with between 40 and 90 per cent advanced work, 18 of them ex-colleges of education; and 260 colleges, the majority further education colleges, doing less than 40 per cent advanced work.

The year 1981 would represent something of a watershed. Although increases in the number of students taking non-advanced and evening institute courses were expected, higher education numbers would reach a peak in 1981 and then gradually decline. The effects of higher fees and the limitation on the number of overseas students represented a change in longstanding government policy that all those capable and willing to take part in higher education should be able to do so.—THES.

Sanctions vote

Members of the Assistant Masters Association in Hampshire are to vote on the introduction of sanctions against the local authority, which wants to increase the size of sixth-form A level teaching groups.

A ballot form has been issued asking if they are in favour of refusing to take classes of more than 15 sixth formers.

Careers handed to them—on a plate

How do pupils find out about jobs? One answer is to invite prospective employers for lunch. TIM ALBERT reports

Over the pizza, chicken casserole, apricot meringue and vases of fresh spring flowers, groups of apparently interested young girls clustered round a gathering of local Rotarians and other worthies.

A bank manager (being controversial and wearing his male chauvinist pig tie) was promising one of the girls a look behind the scenes at his bank. The local curator and borough librarian was being told about the new sixth-form library at the school ("And what is a curator, I've always wanted to know"). The local postmaster was showing anybody who showed the slightest sign of interest a bundle of careers leaflets, while at the same time complaining "They don't seem to know an awful lot about the nature of work, do they?"

In fact the whole exercise had been launched to remedy just such a defect. It was one of a special series of careers lunches put on by Coombe Girls' School in the London borough of Kingston upon Thames last term as a simple, enjoyable way of enabling potential local employers to meet senior pupils and staff informally—over a stand-up lunch prepared by girls.

At this particular lunch there were between 50 and 60 fifth and sixth year girls, each paying 30p for the occasion. Guests (or victims?) included the council's chief executive, a chief inspector of police, a nursing officer, an estate agent, and the head of personnel from the local department store.

They were, of course, mainly a white-collared middle class lot, but then, as careers mistress Mrs Jean Wood explained "In this area it's mainly white collar jobs anyway. There are a few light industries, but all the girls tend to think they'd like to go to work in an office."

The lunch began with a glass of sherry for the guests (provided and paid for by the head), who were then escorted through the school by selected guides. The lunch took place in the television room, and lasted rather longer than the customary school dinner. "And we miss the first period after lunch", said one of the pupils.

At the end of it there had been some narrowing of the gap between work and school. One or two girls had been promised visits to the workplace; they picked up a range of information. Teachers learnt just what employers were looking for (and one coming away clutching a copy of the Post Office's aptitude test for potential employees). The local worthies learnt a bit about what schools were trying to do (much changed since their day, of course) and what kind of pupils this particular school was producing.

And they were impressed. "Absolutely splendid", said the man from the bank. "To be able to talk to them at the level to which I have been talking to them today is quite incredible. The standard of their questions—and their presentation of them—have both been very high."

There were more tangible pay-offs. During the lunch a consulting engineer phoned to say that a friend of his had been to a previous lunch, and also been most impressed, and had the head mistress perhaps one or two girls who would be interested in being trained as tracers?

Mrs Audrey Taylor, the headmistress, said she started the arrangement partly as a reaction to worsening employment, and partly as a way of improving careers education. "We tried to do something a bit different. Most careers meetings are a bit formal, and we were trying to break this down. I must confess that it has turned out much better than I really thought it would."

Iranian bid for school

The owners of a 220-pupil independent school in Nottinghamshire are considering a proposal by families from Iran to start a special school to give their children an English education.

Approaches have been made to the Rodney School, which lies in 25 acres of countryside near Kirklington near Southwell. The Iranians want to start a secondary school for 50 pupils, which they will pay for. Principal and joint owner of the school, Miss Joan Thomas said: "The English method of education is well respected abroad. People overseas set great store by it. The Iranian proposal may go through. It could be next year but there is a lot to think about."

Home cures for blacks in care

There should be more self-help projects run by ethnic minority groups for children now being taken into care, and their parents. This is one recommendation of a discussion pamphlet on black children in residential care, published by the Community Relations Commission.

The commission also recommends that there should be more explanations, and support, for parents, that local minority groups should be involved more closely in homes with black children, that more minority staff should be recruited and existing staff should have more training and support.

Pupils' guide to university visits

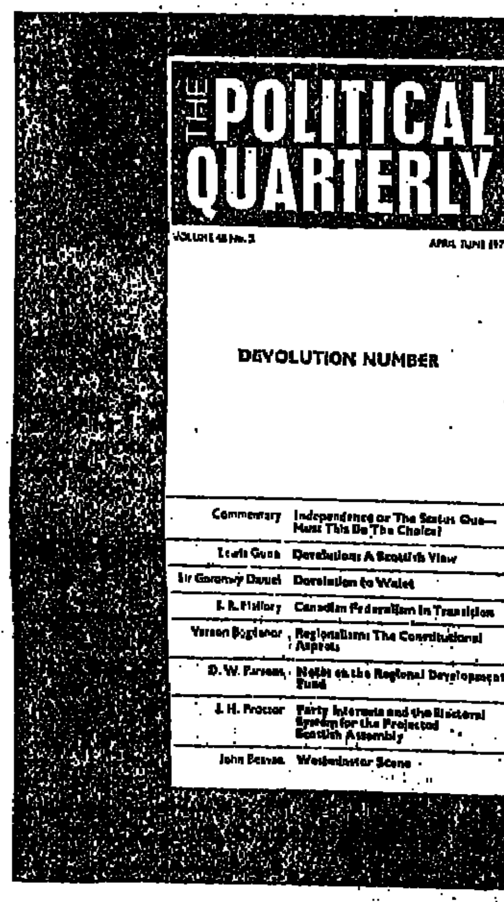
To help students who want to go to university Felicity Taylor and Judith Stone have conducted a survey into which colleges arrange, or would be prepared to arrange, visits for intending students.

The results are listed in View from the Sixth, an annotated list of universities and colleges throughout Britain. Colleges are graded according to the type of arrangement they favour; some offer open days, others full-scale conferences for sixth formers; a third category is willing to supply speakers to visit schools, either to lecture or to meet pupils and parents informally at careers evenings and other gatherings. The list costs 40p and is available from the authors at 5 Robin Grove, London N6.

'Relevance' plea

In a new report on general studies in colleges of further education, the Nottinghamshire County Council education committee has called on the colleges to review the courses and ensure they are relevant to industry's needs.

Students and employers, it says, should have more precise information about the content and purpose of such studies. Employers should be consulted about assessment methods and colleges should prepare counselling and PE programmes for all part-time students.



THE POLITICAL QUARTERLY

DEVOLUTION NUMBER

"Devolution—is it dead, will it revive or are Scotland and Wales destined to go further into the hands of the Nationalists?"

These are the themes of a Special Number of 'The Political Quarterly' where the anti-devolution view is forcefully put by Professor Lewin Gunn of Strathclyde University. In his article he argues that the general approach of the recent Bill was administratively and politically impossible.

Another article, by Vernon Bogdanor at Oxford University, contends that this half-way house between federalism and centralism is untenable.

The contrary view that devolution is desirable and workable in the case of Wales is argued by Sir Goronway Daniel, Principal of Aberystwyth University, and by Professor John Mackintosh, M.P., in his opening commentary, who sees it as the only way to prevent the break up of the United Kingdom.

Part of the political problem is looked at by Professor Proctor, who looks at alternative electoral systems for the devolved bodies.

The international aspect comes out in D. W. Parson's discussion of regional development as operated by the European Commission and the difficulties of running a European policy for the regions when economic development is in the hands of the member states.

Professor J. R. Mallory of McGill University in Montreal considers the Quebec situation and the dangers of any static solution to the demands for greater provincial autonomy.

The whole issue explores the problems that have led to the current impasse in Britain but also presses the point that an administratively feasible and politically satisfactory answer must be found to this problem.

Far too many bad maths teachers

by Bob Doe

The failures of modern mathematics teaching were caused more by the low calibre of teachers than by the contents of syllabuses, Dr Edwin Kerr, president of the Mathematical Association, said at their annual conference in Liverpool last week.

"The greatest problem is the chronic shortage of suitably qualified mathematics teachers", Dr Kerr said. He wants the Government to make special grants to attract mathematicians out of industry into teaching, priority for mathematics teachers in in-service training, and centralized funding for in-service training.

Dr Kerr, who is also chief officer of the Council for National Academic Awards, said that in spite of the general surplus of teachers the shortage of well-qualified mathematics teachers was getting worse. Government estimates were that the shortfall of 1,281 in England and Wales in 1973 had risen to at least 1,859 last year.

A third of the mathematics teaching in secondary schools was done by teachers without an acceptable qualification in mathematics.

He welcomed the Government's scheme, announced in the Budget, to finance through the Training Services Agency the retraining of suitably qualified unemployed teachers. He claimed there were "significant numbers" of these with an A level in mathematics who could be retrained in this way.

But he wanted mathematicians in industry contemplating a move to teaching to be encouraged to take teacher-training courses with TSA grants that would make up some of the difference between student grants and their industrial salaries.

Schemes using peripatetic mathematics teachers and staff borrowed from industry and further and higher education should all be considered but would not solve the problem. Not enough were available and it would be difficult to ensure continuity of teaching. "We must use in-service courses to improve the qualifications of existing staff", he said.

Expansion of inservice training was the Government's policy but the numbers of teachers on such courses was still very low. "Maybe we need to develop a national budget for in-service education", he said, though he recognized this would not be popular with local authorities.

Mathematics teaching should get priority in the spending of in-service money. "I would justify this on the basis of the chronic shortage of mathematics teachers and the key nature of the subject."

Dr Kerr also referred to a proposal currently being considered in mathematics circles to restrict mathematics teaching at certain levels to teachers with appropriate qualifications. Only graduates, for instance, would be allowed to teach sixth-form mathematics.

The proposal does not include any suggestion that salaries should be directly linked to these levels of competence, though of course these would be taken into account for promotion purposes.

Music festival moves

by Robin Maconie

The National Festival of Music for Youth, which has become one of the major annual events of British music, marks its seventh season this year with a move to London's South Bank.

Organized and presented by the Association of Musical Instrument Industries and sponsored by The Times Educational Supplement, the festival will display the best of British school and youth music simultaneously at the Royal Festival Hall, the Queen Elizabeth Hall and the Purcell Room on July 9.

The move to London is a further step toward establishing the national festival more firmly in the public mind as a concert rather than "just a competition". In London it will be accessible to a wider public. The move will also allow smaller ensembles to be heard in halls of appropriate size.

Other changes include the setting up of an honorary panel of advisers, including Sir Lennox Berkeley, Yehudi Menuhin, Andre Previn and Malcolm Williamson, Master of the Queen's Musick. The festival is now also affiliated to the British Federation of Music Festivals and the United Kingdom Council for Music Education.

Interesting, too, though on a less elevated plane, is the decision to admit the piano as a solo instrument in the festival's concerto section. As with voices in 1976, it is now felt that the instrumental range and character of the festival is firmly enough established for there to be no risk of its dwindling into a voice-and-piano dominated affair. It is no surprise, therefore, that the ranks of festival supporters have been swelled by the addition of the Piano Manufacturers' Association.

Selection of participants this year is once again made on the basis of audition by tape recording or by appearance at one of the many regional primaries arranged according to demand at schools throughout the country. This will put great emphasis on quality of repertoire.

The nine categories of entrant are determined by general considerations of size, character and scope rather than height of brow. Class 1, open class orchestras, is open to school and county youth orchestras; Class 2 is limited to senior orchestras belonging to one teaching establishment. Class 3, concerto, is open to those finalists of classes 1 and 2 who wish to present a movement of a concerto for any solo instrument.

Chamber music, Class 4, is loosely defined as "music for up to nine instruments which preferably has not been adapted for the combination performing but originally written for it". Classes 5 and 6, brass and wind bands, are self-explanatory; Class 7, recorder ensembles, admits "an accompanying instrument".

Open class instrumental ensembles, Class 8, casts a particularly wide net, from big band jazz to broken consorts, over an area usually marked by more variety than categorical consistency. This section may be subdivided if circumstances permit and the award scheme for excellence has also been kept flexible.

Class 9 embraces all junior instrumental ensembles involving combinations of instruments outside the scope of the general syllabus. In the past this class has produced some of the festival's most exciting innovations and delightful music, and has been the most accurate monitor of new ideas in music teaching, as distinct from interpretation and performance.

In brief

New improved holidays

Play schemes, language teaching and other educational projects for the Easter and summer holidays are being financed under the Home Office's Urban Aid Programme. A total of 312 projects in urban areas have been approved at a cost of £250,000.

Boost for social workers

More grants for postgraduate students who have got places this year on courses leading to the Certificate of Qualification in Social Work are being provided by the Department of Health. These grants should largely offset the expected shortfall in seconding students to these courses and follow strong lobbying by the Central Council for Education and Training in Social Work.

New Cornish theatre

The first production of Cornwall's new youth theatre was staged this week at Redruth School and the sixth form college, St Austell. A cast of 25 young people aged between 16 and 21 performed T. S. Eliot's Murder in the Cathedral. They came from schools as far apart as Bude and Marazion.

See the sea and paint

The Marine Society is looking for another young artist to go to sea in the Merchant Navy to teach seafarers how to paint and draw. The appointment is for one or two years and the salary is £2,100 a year, plus free board and lodging. The society has sent five artists to sea over the past 10 years.

Miss Baird in top union job

Miss Joyce Baird has been appointed general secretary of the Association of Assistant Mistresses. Miss Baird, who is 47, is president of the association. She will work in tandem with Miss Sheila Wood, the general secretary, from September, and will take over the job completely when Miss Wood retires next year.

Miss Baird is head of the geography department at the Hertfordshire and Essex High School, Bishop's Stortford. She is a member of the governing council of the Schools Council and represents the AAM on the Cambridge University Local Examinations Syndicate.

The merger of the association with the Assistant Masters' Association is rapidly nearing completion and is expected to be finalized by the end of this year.

It is likely that administrative posts will be doubled-up after the merger with equal numbers of men and women servicing the combined union. Members in the regions will be asked to elect two executives for each area and, although sex discrimination laws forbid men or women only elections, the hope is that there will be a balanced executive committee.

The new union will have about 80,000 members, making it the third largest teachers' organization.

● Miss Ann Gray, head of English at Wakefield High School for Girls, has been elected president of the mistresses' association for 1978.

Professor H. P. Grice, University of California, Berkeley, has been appointed John Locke lecturer for 1977-78 at Oxford University.

The view from County Hall

Community education is the fashionable watchword, but the base of Somerset's strategy for youth is its approach to further education.

Elsewhere, the term is used increasingly to mean full-time college courses, as when DES ministers claim that FE numbers have doubled. In rural counties it still means to a great extent part-time adult education, and in Somerset, a good deal besides.

The county's further education service links the colleges, the schools, the village community organizations, the youth service, and careers work. It is the mechanism through which the education committee and the chief education officer, Barry Taylor, hope to get the adults, teenagers, and children to share fully the country's limited resources.

The levers which operate the mechanism are the unconventional top management structure set up three years ago when the truncated authority faced a reorganized future as one of Britain's smallest, county L.e.a.s. A deputy C.E.O. became responsible to Barry Taylor for FE: and under him are three education officers, the third tier in the departmental hierarchy, in charge respectively of youth services and adult education, FE administration and careers.

Quietly, the team started to encourage schools and further education principals to work more closely with youth workers and voluntary organizations, and to offer their facilities more freely to adult community bodies. The county had been committed since 1968 to basing its youth work increasingly on schools: now the new team stepped up the policy of providing youth clubs on the campus and teacher-trained youth tutors to direct their activities.

Then, in July, 1975, Barry Taylor virtually did a Callaghan—with a paper calling for a county-wide debate to establish how people felt educational resources should be used and run.

"The public usually knows what it wants and it behoves us all to realize that no one, not even educators, has a monopoly of opinion on what education in its broadest sense is all about". Mr Taylor told the education and cultural services committee.

The nine months of discussions which followed in towns and villages throughout Somerset demonstrated clearly that the public, whether or not it knew what it wanted, often had very strong views about what it did not want.

Says the deputy CEO for further education: "There was a great deal of anxiety among the adults that they would lose their independence and that their activities would come under the control of county hall, and some misgiving among heads that they would be subject to all kinds of interference. We had to make it plain that we were not trying to impose any kind of formula from the county hall Robin Wakinshaw, the assistant education officer in charge of youth work, says: "The youth service and in particular the voluntary organizations, were afraid that they would lose their identity in an adult-dominated community approach. We had to persuade both them and the adult groups that bringing the young into the community doesn't mean that they either disappear or dinsrupt what is already going on.

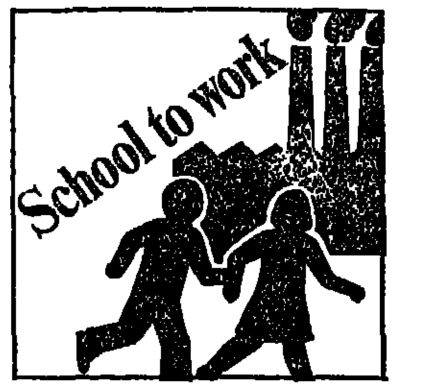
In the course of the debate, groups in some localities started to make their own moves towards a joint community service: at Huish Episcopi, a village near Taunton, the school governors asked that the youth wing of the school should become a community wing, and that the tutor and the area's youth officer should have a responsibility for community education.

Last spring, a working party of the education committee put forward proposals for the new community education structure in a consultative document which triggered off a further nine months of debate. Meetings often vigorously argumentative, were held with more than 50 groups from adult education, the youth service, schools, and district councils. In the end some of the groups remained unshakeably opposed to the proposals, although a large majority agreed with them.

Under the plan, new area administrations coinciding with district council boundaries will run the county's youth service and adult education jointly. The area FE principals and youth officers will make way for an area community education officer and an assistant, who will be responsible both to local school governors and the local youth committee. They will be expected to find out what the community wants and to help provide it, working closely with district councils.

In approving the plan, the education committee has decided to demonstrate that it means what it says about being flexible and letting communities move at their own pace. It has agreed to put off the introduction of the new structure in the Yeovil area, where there is considerable opposition to it.



Inner city teachers and youth workers see themselves in the front line in the battle against deprivation and teenage unemployment, a view that the Government backs with urban aid and allowances in the rate support grant.

But is it all that idyllic for young people down in Britain's broad acres? MARK JACKSON has been taking a brief rural ride in the South West. Here he reports on how youth is faring far away from the city streets.

'A boring green wasteland . . .'

Somerset is still Zummerzet, despite the M5 motorway, local government reorganization, and the cultural leavening of the television age. A verdant haven for the old, it can be a boring green wasteland for the restless teenager without a car.

Last month the county's education and cultural services committee took a policy decision which assumes that the best hope for the young is to get together with their elders. In deciding to push ahead with the integration of youth services and adult education, the committee recognizes that the key problem of rural youth is not alienation but isolation.

The problem exists in pockets throughout other English counties, wherever branch line and bus route closures have left those who are too young to drive marooned in village backwaters along with the very old and the poor.

But in Somerset it is a county-wide situation which governs the authority's approach to youth work.

Neighbouring Devon and Dorset both have big seaside resorts and former county boroughs to provide focal points for entertainment, communications, and change. Peter Walker's reorganization handed over Somerset's one county borough, Bath, to Avon's corporate management, together with the county's only sizable seaside resort, Weston-super-Mare. It left Somerset with nearly a million acres of cow country, one town of 40,000 inhabitants and only three others with as much as half that number, so that most of the 400,000 population is scattered among villages and hamlets.

At national conferences Somerset's youth staff feel their own sense of isolation when colleagues from the big cities agonize over the difficulties of providing an attractive alternative to commercial discos and bars which, they say, rip off the footloose young. Outside Taunton, apart from a few cinemas and bingo halls in the smaller towns, the commercial entertainment is the pub, available to the under-18s only where the landlord and the village bobby are prepared to conspire in a rural slurring of the law.

The difficulty is not in persuading the youngsters to use what the youth service has to offer: it is almost entirely one of providing enough facilities where they can get at them. Michael Sharp, the deputy chief education officer for further education, says that the youth service does not have to worry much about whether it should concentrate on disadvantaged groups or try to spread its resources over all the young.

"You can say that being young here in itself implies a measure of social deprivation", he explains. "There is no real question of a youth revolt, or of the young setting themselves apart in a self-conscious youth culture. In the main the adults control the key facilities: transport, the pubs, the village halls, school premises, and sports facilities. The need is for young people to be accepted fully as part of the community."

Thursday night is youth night in the village hall

Curry Rivel used to be called the richest living in England. A village of 2,000 souls on the road from Taunton to a place few people have heard of, it lived for centuries on the patronage of fashionable landowners down between the London seasons.

The village hall is a fairly sizeable crumb from a rich man's table, built and endowed by a private benefactor. Local trustees control its use. Thursday night is youth night, as distinguished from the evenings when adult badminton or bingo make the rafters ring.

The youth service pays £5.50 to hire the hall, bringing its own pop records, board games, and rented amusement machines. Three paid part-timers, all with teaching or other experience in urban areas, run the club, marvelling at how easily youngsters from Curry and three smaller villages around are contented. Robin Wakinshaw looked around the hangar-like main hall, used by the local school during the day, and said: "It's really just a covered-in street."

He meant that the kids were doing much what young people would do on the streets or in the backrooms of his own native South Shields: sitting around chatting in groups, playing cards, draughts, or darts.

District youth leader Ray Holland says that the youth service would like to be able to use the hall a great deal more, but has no alternative but to be grateful for the present arrangement.

His part-time colleague, Roy Stanford, reckons that kids have a better time, on the whole, in Birmingham. "They're trapped here, with virtually nothing for them.

Wellington is a market town seven miles from Taunton. The Court Fields County comprehensive on its outskirts prides itself on respectable academic standards, and has taken time to get used to the idea of a youth club on the campus, open to the ex-pupils who left at 16.

On Friday night they were unwelcome even at the youth wing. It is the night when the club is reserved for the under-16s. While, inside the new single-storey building, pubescent girls and sweet chewing fourth-year boys rocked to the call of a deafening disco, a group of the older lads and their girl friends hung about disconsolately outside.

Juliet Megee, the 27-year-old youth tutor, said unhappily: "I find it terribly difficult not to let them come in. There is nothing else for them, or they wouldn't be here." But the youth wing has to run its age-segregated session once a week to meet the fears of some parents that association with the older teenagers will endanger their daughters' virtue or lead their sons into bad habits."

The group chatting sporadically outside did not look particularly amorous or delinquent. At 10 o'clock, when their younger brothers and sisters came cheerfully out to greet them, they went off quietly with the rest.

Wanted: more jobs

In whatever ways the rural young are missing out, they are sharing in the great experience of their generation—the new and growing fear of unemployment.

A county depending largely on agriculture and on diverse small specialist crafts and industries is not as vulnerable as the great industrial regions to the short-term crises of the economy. But jobs that do go as firms contract or close, or learn to do with fewer workers, are not easily replaced in better days.

Somerset had 600 under 18s, most of them school leavers out of work last September: about 140 of them have since found work, and another 100 or so have places on various government training courses or schemes. In terms of relative numbers, the current unemployment situation is a good deal better than in most cities—but the long-term prospects are possibly more disquieting.

Frank Robinson, the education officer for careers, says that structural youth unemployment, the permanent shortage of jobs for young workers which economists are beginning to believe is built into advanced capitalist economies, is likely to affect areas like his own particularly badly.

The same isolation which hits the social life of country youngsters makes it difficult or impossible to take jobs further afield when there are none left in their own locality, he says. And the county as a whole, with no particular advantages in raw materials, communications, or major pools of skilled labour, will find it very difficult to persuade new enterprises to set up in the places where the young people are.

It means, Mr Robinson and his colleagues say, that rural school leavers need as much help and preparation to improve their chances of getting and keeping jobs as do city youngsters. And because a young worker's reputation quickly spreads in districts where firms are few and employers tend to know each other, it is particularly important that he should be equipped to give the right impression from the very first.

How a country community copes with its unemployable

Down in Taunton Bruce Bond is busy reducing the supply of what others might call the village idiots.

Country communities do not often bother with diagnostic niceties: the slow witted and those whose behaviour does not match the accepted norms risk being written off as not right in the head. With jobs increasingly hard to get for everyone, the products of the ESN schools and of child guidance may face a lifetime of pauperdom or domestic drudgery.

Carol, Charles, Jean, Alice . . (these are not their real names) all left special schools last summer, the educational system having done, apparently, all for them that it could. None of them knew how to get a bus, or use a telephone. They had no idea of how to start looking for a job, or what sort of work they might possibly be able to do. Everyone assumed that social security was their best bet.

There are still a lot of things that Carol, brain-damaged in an accident at the age of three, cannot do, particularly those that involve much in the way of logic or decisions. But she can now assemble a particular component used in a military night sight, a fiddly bit of very precise manipulation.

Charles would strike anyone as very slow; but so would the way a photographic glazing drum moves round. The prints have to be lined up with finicky care and watched painstakingly: Charles is proud and happy to look after them, and shows no trace of the boredom or irritation that makes most people botch the job.

Nobody watching Jean at work behind the cafeteria counter would think of her as anything but a deft and competent worker . . . unless, of course, they had learnt already to regard her as ESN and unemployable. Alan, another ESN, is learning carpentry and is in line for an apprenticeship in the building trade.

All four owe their changed life prospects to Bruce Bond, a 29-year-old former teacher in special education, the Somerset education department which employs him, and as least as much to the creative compassion of the students at Somerset College of Art and Technology. In the autumn of 1974 the governors of one of the local schools asked the authority to see it it could arrange some sort of course to help handicapped school leavers whose disabilities—physical or behavioural—would make it difficult for them to find work.

The careers service thought it would be a good idea, but by the time a scheme for a work preparation course had been worked out, it was overtaken by the economic recession. Although the recession made the plight of the handicapped leavers more critical, it also made it virtually impossible for the authority to provide the resources. With more ordinary school leavers staying on for further education courses, there was not even accommodation for the special course.

The following autumn, hoping to launch a pilot course at the turn of the year, the careers service asked the Training Services Agency, eager patron of many kinds of new further education training courses, if it would help. The reply, which arrived after the course was due to begin, refused money but offered course materials; an offer which subsequently turned out to mean only advice, which the careers service was not soliciting.

Bruce Bond was prepared to run the course without equipment or furniture, or any kind of budget, counting on being able to scrounge essential materials in one way or another. The students' union solved the accommodation problem by offering to sacrifice half their games room temporarily, and the first course began in September.

Ten school leavers are on the course, chosen from a batch recommended by heads, educational psychologists, and careers officers. They are able to draw social security benefits and the authority pays their travel costs.

The course syllabus contains most of what is coming to be called vocational preparation—coaching in practical living skills including shopping and using public transport, familiarization with the key aspects of working life—job hunting, safety, industrial discipline, and trade unions; and, where necessary, remedial literacy and numeracy; it also deals with personal relationships and social behaviour. But a major part of the time is spent providing practical experience of work—not by sending the students out to firms, but by bringing the work into the college.

The students are set to work on various simple industrial processes, first as part of diagnosing the abilities and weaknesses, and then as exercises in concentration and stamina: afterwards they go on to various departments of the college, learning how the adults on the staff work. Sometimes, like Jean and Alan, they end up receiving a specific craft training, either on a normal course or in some part of the college administration; or like Carol, they may show particular aptitude for one of the jobs set them originally as exercises.

The course is open-ended, although Bruce Bond expects that by the end of six months students are likely to be almost ready to go to work, if they are ever going to be employable at all. With a waiting list, and no resources to expand the capacity of the course, he says, it would be wrong either to keep on students indefinitely or to tolerate absenteeism or half-heartedness. "If they can't learn to take this seriously, there is not much chance that they'll be able to hold down a job. I tell them we're not going to be mucked about."

Store's counter argument for training

Taunton's only big independently owned department store, Hatcher's, has to fight hard against the retail chains to survive. But it closes every Tuesday morning so that the managing director can lead a short training session for its 170 staff.

The store has done some sort of training for its 201 years' existence: indeed, in the last century Miss Hatcher's Young Ladies lived on the premises and were schooled to rigid standards of deportment and morality. But it was the arrival of industrial training legislation and the Distributive Industry Training Board in the mid-sixties that prompted the management to establish a modern planned training programme.

Since then all the store's buyers as well as its senior management have qualified as instructors on training board courses: between them they cover the needs of the shop floor staff, the administration, and themselves.

Three years ago, with life getting rough in the high streets, Hatcher's management thought they could use the Tuesday morning better taking money. In February last year they decided that had been a mistake, and reinstated the training sessions.

The training officer, Mrs Jean Larn, says: "It was a straightforward commercial decision. Performance was falling off, and it was costing us money. People were getting sloppy about accounting procedures and credit checks, and the selling staff were not all giving the standard of service that we consider vital for our survival.

"I think that we were really glad to have it demonstrated to us that training wasn't a luxury." But the imperatives of competition can hardly account for Hatcher's readiness to cooperate enthusiastically in work experience schemes for the town's school pupils and leavers. Over the past year the store has given a succession of 15-year-olds from a local secondary a week each of carefully supervised work.

Mrs Larn says that the management feels that it has a stake in the community and that it must do what it can to help local young people prepare for an increasingly demanding adult world. She and her colleagues enjoy their presence in the store: they are for the most part, she says, "wonderful kids", and often likely material for later recruitment.

The rules of the education department's work experience scheme, which insures the pupils and places a considerable administrative load on the school as well as the careers service, forbid payment; but firms are allowed to help with out-of-pocket expenses, and Mrs Larn slips each youngster a fiver on the last day — "because it makes them feel appreciated".

In addition, the store has two jobless youngsters for six months under the Manpower Services Commission work experience scheme—an 18-year-old with respectable A levels who is attached to the accounts department, and a 17-year-old with some O levels who is waiting to join the forces. Hatcher's is ready, on the basis of its experience, to take more of them.

What Mrs Larn says is not on as far as her company is concerned is the new unified vocational preparation scheme, which would mean sending off young employees on three month courses in return for a £10-a-week government grant towards their wages. "That would cover less than half the cost of employing staff in their place. With competition the way it is, we simply cannot afford to volunteer to take on that sort of burden."

Mrs Larn believes that sort of thing should be done in the schools, which should make teaching more relevant to the problems of adult living and to work: although she doubts whether many teachers really understand what the ordinary working world is like. She would like to help change that by providing teachers, too, with work experience:

"I'd be glad to have a headmistress in the hairdressing department for a week or two", she says. "She really would learn a lot of very useful things". Mrs Larn does not want to see youngsters who are going to work behind counters encouraged to stay on at school longer than they must.

"Our girls need to be able to read and write well, to add up, and to have the right manner. A levels would simply give them ideas and make them restless".

A radical experiment in local decision-taking is running into difficulties. Michael Binyon, North America correspondent, reports from California

SACRAMENTO

The Reform in Secondary Education (RISE), the programme that the state Department of Education in California believes to be the biggest change in the organization of its secondary schools for many years, does not yet exist.

The multi-million dollar project to give local communities more say in the running of their schools was vetoed last year by Governor Jerry Brown, but for a year or so eight schools in the state have been working as though the reform had come into effect. The evidence from these pilot schools suggests that RISE will be exhilarating, expensive and exhausting.

Cubberly High School is a typical large school with a solid reputation serving a pleasant middle-income district about 40 miles south of San Francisco. Last July it applied for federal money available for innovations, said it wanted to try out the RISE ideas and began drawing up its proposals.

From the start Cubberly found it had taken on something rather revolutionary. The first requirement was to elect a site council. This consisted of four parents, four pupils, four teachers, the school principal and two others—who the principal decided should be from the school's non-teaching staff.

The election was very thorough with nominations, statements and ballots sent out to every home. Teachers elected teachers, parents elected parents and the pupils, opting to have one representative from each year, elected the pupils.

The task of the site council, according to the RISE programme, was to plan the philosophy of the school. That sounded rather grandiose, and indeed the council found the task daunting. Everyone had traditional ideas of the roles of teachers, parents and pupils: the idea that each member of the council had an equal vote and each could question the fundamental principles on which the school was run seemed novel.

The committee took two approaches, asking teachers how things could be improved in their departments, and asking themselves what should happen in the school that was not happening. They were careful to talk about RISE as a "renewal" rather than a "reform".

At the end of a term's work, the council was presented with several suggestions. One was for better teaching of reading, with better testing and small group instruction. Another, largely the brainchild of the parents, was for an alternative programme offering more traditional teaching to any pupils who wanted it.

This last suggestion is now being considered by the council. The idea is that parents and pupils could ask at the beginning of term to be assigned to classes where the style of teaching was "traditional" and structured. The council has already rejected an earlier suggestion for the physical separation of pupils wanting traditional teaching into an "academy" because this was thought to be divisive.

The coordinator of the pilot project said RISE, though similar in concept to the Early Childhood Education Programme now introduced in many California schools, was much more difficult to administer. "High schools are very different from elementary schools. They have different departments, each of which is more independent, and they have a more settled curriculum. It takes time to change things."

It could be asked whether this systematic review of a school's philosophy, which the RISE programme insists on, should not be held way. The trouble is this takes lot of time and planning and energy and money to pay for people's time. Governor Brown, in vetoing RISE throughout the state, said all schools should go through this exercise did not need extra money to do

A second important part of the proposed reform is the yearly provision of unattached funds for special projects that the school site committee thinks important for the school. Cubberly has already decided what it wants to spend the money on.

One thing is integrating art into the school curriculum. Another is developing a course in the study of the future, a relatively untried area of knowledge. It is interdisciplinary and involves the study of social and economic questions, trends and predictions and uses many of the techniques of history.

Future RISE projects may include what is called "competency-based education", establishing minimum standards for getting a graduation certificate, and opening up the curriculum to include multi-cultural relations and history studies of major ethnic groups. But all this must wait for discussion by the site committee next year.

The budget for the RISE pilot project was $50,000 this year. In the next two years it will be $100 a pupil in the middle school and $65 a pupil in the senior school—a total of $145,000.

But after that the future is uncertain. The pilot project is funded by Washington for only three years. Now that Governor Brown has vetoed the scheme for California, Cubberly may find that the effort and enthusiasm generated in the past year vanishes with the end of the experiment. "The big problem", the project coordinator said, "is what then?"

Innovator who ignored the call to Washington

SACRAMENTO

Dr Wilson Riles is probably one of the most influential education administrators in the United States. As California's Superintendent of Public Instruction he is responsible for education in America's largest, and in many ways trend-setting, state. He is closely identified with the successful reforms in elementary education and those proposed for secondary education. He is easily the best known black in the world of education.

Dr Riles has staked his formidable reputation on the success of the Early Childhood Education Programme and on the adoption of the ideas proposed in the Reform in Secondary Education (RISE) programme. It therefore came as a bitter blow to him when Governor Jerry Brown vetoed the RISE programme last year, a veto that led to considerable friction between two of California's most popular elected officials.

But Wilson Riles is not a man to be put off easily. He knows that, following a recent court judgment, the Governor must introduce some widespread reforms into the system of local financing of education in California. And he knows that the Governor needs a major reform to his credit for re-election. Dr Riles is quietly confident, therefore, that he can get most of the ideas put back in the new package the Governor is drumming up support for.

To "manoeuvre" in the highly charged political atmosphere of Sacramento, the state capital, requires experience, and a firm purpose. Dr Riles has both. He began his career in the Department of Education in 1958 and was made associate superintendent in 1965, administering a compensatory education programme which became a model for similar programmes throughout America.

But his success in the 1970 election for Superintendent—the first time he had run for public office—was due to his insistence that the office must be used, as his slogan said, "For the Children". His predecessor, a flamboyant right-winger, had spent too long in the headlines and too little time in the schools, it was widely perceived, on unedifying campaigns such as trying to revoke the certification of teachers who changed sex.

With his reforms still uncompleted, last December he was forced to make a cruel choice. President-elect Carter wanted him in the Government: as a widely respected black educator, he was an obvious choice, and had been among the president's early advisers in Plains.

But Riles wanted to finish his work in California. He knew that if he went the reforms might get bogged down. He also believes there should be a separate Department of Education in Washington, and this Carter campaign promise has so far not come much closer to reality. So he turned down a post.

A large man with a big laugh, his concerns and pronouncements have remained in line with his campaign slogan, "For the Children": a current preoccupation is the high level of violence and the encouragement television gives this.

Riles: "For the Children".

Bussing is another matter that Riles believes must be considered from the child's point of view. Does it work? Does it make for better education, happier classes? Committed as he is to equal opportunity for blacks, the handicapped and all minorities, Riles does not believe bussing the be-all and end-all.

As he says, a teacher who does not want to be where he is will not teach well, and a pupil who feels uneasy in class will not learn much. Bussing must not be rejected. But other schemes—"magnet schools", for example—can sometimes speed up integration more effectively.

New education chief starts bureaucracy shakeup

WASHINGTON

A thorough reorganization of the Office of Education is to be put into effect immediately by the new Commissioner, Dr Ernest Boyer.

Some 26 staff offices which formerly all reported directly to him have been regrouped and simplified, leaving only seven directly responsible to the Commissioner.

At the same time all "affirmative action" programmes aimed at encouraging opportunities for racial minority groups, women and the handicapped have been brought together in a single office to emphasize the government's commitment to this.

Dr Boyer said nothing that was being done would stand in the way of any future separation of the Office of Education from the Department of Health, Education and Welfare if President Carter decided to create a separate Department of Education.

But for the moment the changes were aimed at concentrating on the three top priorities, which, he said were, in order: access—promoting equality of opportunity for women, minorities, the elderly, handicapped and other historically by-passed groups; excellence—the improvement of reading and writing and a strengthening of the teaching of basic skills in America; and new directions—looking at the connexions between schools and the home, work, cultural institutions and community groups.

Inconclusive' migrant anguage experiment

David Dungworth

Four years ago the Bavarian Ministry of Education, with the support of the Federal Ministry for Education and Science, embarked on a language-teaching experiment for immigrant children. An interim report has now been published by the State Institute for Educational Research and Educational Planning in Munich, which is responsible for the design and supervision of the project.

Underlying most of the problems faced by immigrant children is their poor command of the German language. This is the main reason why between 55 and 60 per cent fail to obtain a secondary modern school-leaving certificate, the basic requirement for them to proceed to vocational training.

The aim of the Bavarian experiment is to provide a bi-cultural, bilingual education which will enable foreign children to obtain the school qualifications necessary for them to take up apprenticeships or employment in the Federal Republic and to give them enough knowledge of their native language and customs for them to return to their country of origin if they want to.

An essential feature of the scheme is that the native language is the medium of instruction for academic subjects during the early years with German having the status of a second language. For those pupils who go on to take school-leaving examinations German will replace English as the compulsory foreign language.

German occupies an increasing part of the curriculum in later years. In the first and second years of primary school, six and seven year olds receive 23 hours of instruction a week in their native language and five hours of German. In the following two years the German component is increased to eight hours a week. At secondary level the proportions are 20 hours in the native language and 12 hours German for the first two years and 10 and 20 hours respectively during the final three years of compulsory schooling.

Experimental classes may be formed in state schools when there are a minimum of 25 pupils who speak the same foreign language. They join the same groups as German children for subjects in which the language of instruction is less important, such as art, domestic science, handicraft, music and physical education. Provided his German is good enough a foreign child may transfer to a normal class at any time at the request of his parents.

The number of special language classes has expanded from 81 in 1973-74 to 318 in the current school year and they now accommodate 10,457 of Bavaria's 37,442 immigrant children. They are popular with the pupils themselves because they remove the pressure for attendance in the afternoons and at weekends at native language classes organized by the consulates of the countries from which the vast majority of West Germany's "guest workers" come, Turkey, Greece, Italy and Yugoslavia.

One of their positive contributions has been to promote contact between the school and the home as the parents of children in the experimental classes visit form teachers more than twice as frequently as the normal average.

The proportion of pupils who have to repeat a school year is slightly lower than in conventional classes. So is the number of legitimate absences from school, while the truancy rate is markedly lower.

No significant difference has been detected between pupils in experimental classes and those in normal classes as regards their command of German. Since one would expect the latter to be more proficient because they are among German children throughout the school day, more rigorous investigations are to be carried out.

On the debit side the report expresses concern that the division into separate classes for academic subjects reduces the amount of contact between German and foreign pupils. It therefore falls short of the ideal of full social integration for immigrant pupils called for by the Conference of Länder Education Ministers.

The Bavarian project is intended to overcome the criticism that most of West Germany's immigrant children emerge from school "half-educated in two languages". Final judgment on its success will be reserved until it is seen how many of those from the new classes gain entrance to intermediate or grammar schools or at least a secondary modern school leaving certificate.

Muslims to set up world education centre

This month's First World Conference on Muslim Education (TES, April 1) in Mecca asked Muslim governments to order the closure of Christian missionary schools operating in their countries and appealed to Muslim parents not to send their children to such schools.

The conference, held under the auspices of King Abdul Aziz University, Mecca, and attended by 210 educationists from throughout the Muslim world, was called to draw up a programme to re-create the Islamic system of learning.

It was argued that the spread of western education and values was leading to a breakdown of identity in the Muslim world.

The conference called for the setting up of a World Centre for Muslim Education which would "plan an educational policy that is based on Islamic outlook and that derives its principles from Islamic sources, together with providing detailed curricula for various subjects as well as preparing textbooks suitable for the various levels of education from kindergarten to university".

The conference also resolved that until the centre is established the organizing committee of the conference should stay in existence to monitor progress.

Australia

Big protests over spending freeze

from William Purvis

SYDNEY

After the success of a day of national protest last week teachers throughout Australia are planning to maintain their campaign for more education funds.

Protest meetings in all state capitals and some large regional centres attracted about 4,000 teachers.

The theme of the protest was a call for the federal government to break its freeze on education spending and pledge increased funds in the forthcoming budget.

The federal government will be sending its guidelines to the Schools Commission at the end of this month. The most important item will be the financial limits imposed on the commission—the limits within which it will have to operate for the next year.

If those limits are unsatisfactory to the teachers they will intensify their campaign.

If some of the reports coming from Canberra are accurate the teachers could be in for a long, hard campaign. Senator John Carrick, Education Minister, is said to be fighting a hard battle in Cabinet to maintain the level of spending on education.

The federal Treasurer, Mr Lynch, backed by the Treasury, is reported to be demanding substantial cuts in some areas of expenditure, including education, health and welfare.

Meanwhile, in a joint statement the Australian Teachers' Federation, the Technical and Further Education Teachers' Association and the Council of State School Organizations has noted with concern that the Minister has failed to clarify the government's intentions on future education funding.

France

English teaching may be 'downgraded'

from Mark Webster

PARIS

The Education Ministry is launching a new drive on the near-monopoly of the English language in French schools.

At present, 84 per cent of children learning either one or two foreign languages choose English. Its nearest rival is German, which is chosen by 19 per cent. Despite considerable efforts by successive Education Ministers, Italian and Spanish have both lost ground.

M René Haby, the Education Minister, now proposes to encourage the teaching of minor languages by releasing more funds. But he has kept the requirement that at least 15 children are necessary to justify opening a class for a second language of English or German, and a minimum of eight for other languages.

His anxiety stems from the phenomenal growth in secondary school students choosing English as their first foreign language.

In 1958, out of 856,000 children choosing their first language, 76 per cent chose English, 19 per cent German, 4 per cent Spanish and 1 per cent Italian. For 1975-76, the number of children doing a first foreign language had risen to 4,470,000, of whom 81 per cent chose English and 16 per cent German, while the other two were almost wiped off the language teaching map, with 2.7 per cent learning Spanish and 0.3 per cent learning Italian.

Part of the problem is the inconsistent attitude of the Ministry of Education. In 1965, M Christian Souchet created a course leading to a baccalauréat in three foreign languages which favoured the less popular languages. Then, in 1970, the Ministry created the option of dropping a second foreign language in favour of a "reinforced" course in the first language, doubling the hours of classes from three to six.

Such a scheme was bound to favour English as the most popular first language and it provoked an outcry from university students, who were afraid such an action would limit the number of teaching posts.

Following a protracted series of strikes M Souchet promised the introduction of a "scholastic chart" which would ensure that at least five foreign languages (English, German, Spanish, Italian and Russian) were available in every secondary school from the first year. It has never become a reality because of administrative difficulties in the schools and the lack of cash in the Ministry.

Nor will the language crusade get a great deal of support from M Haby, because he is not convinced of the merits of learning a second foreign language when only one in 10 children ever put their first foreign language to any real use. Nonetheless, he is eager to make sure that English does not get a total monopoly.

M Haby is also keen to see greater emphasis on the teaching of such languages as Portuguese, because of the large number of immigrant children, and on Arabic because of its potential as a commercial language.

M Haby does not have an ally in President Giscard d'Estaing, who says openly that in his conversations with the German Chancellor, Helmut Schmidt, he uses English.

Blame it all on apathy

Sir,—I have been interested to read in the Great Debate of the reasons for the falling standards in education. The reasons seem to centre around an inability on the part of educationists to agree on the best system of education. Should it be formal or progressive? Should it be streamed or mixed ability? Should it be grammar or comprehensive?

I may be naive, but I firmly believe that the system employed is secondary to the commitment of the people implementing it. Having recently finished teaching in a middle school, I think, from my experiences there, that the most insidious force at work in education today is the number of teachers, at both top and bottom, who are neither actively interested in nor in the least enthusiastic for children or teaching.

A typical day in my former school consisted of an assembly from the head, read from a book in a detached monotone, lessons conducted in splendid isolation, untroubled by either headteacher or interested colleague, break time in the staff room marked by the usual complaints about children's behaviour. The afternoon was much the same, highlighted by a "Le Mans" getaway from the staff car park.

I do not pretend that what I have outlined is typical of a great many schools, but I believe it is symptomatic of what is wrong in education. One of the important factors in a teacher's make-up is the warmth for and understanding of the children and their needs. The system only provides the framework within which this operates. Likewise, if teachers should care for the children, they should care for each other.

They should be willing to learn from one another, be interested in what others are doing, they should be constantly and positively taking stock of the total school situation. The reality, as I experienced it, was a staff who rarely spoke of matters educational (the most heated exchange in a staff meeting came in a discussion of holiday dates).

Any members of staff who did comment on the complacency were conveniently labelled unprofessional. That, of course, means by all means contemplate what is wrong, but on no account ever express it. Negativity was the watchword. The message for all was quite clear: keep your head firmly immersed in the sand.

I point the finger at the complacent, those who are in teaching for sheer convenience, those who revel in their unaccountability both to their fellows and, more important, to themselves. For, while the teachers who openly champion the different causes are constantly pilloried for their inability to agree despite their professional concern, those teachers who neither think about nor, what is worse, care about the state of their school, let alone education in general, carry on dispensing their apathy, indifference, and cynicism with disastrous consequences to child, school, and education alike.

NAME AND ADDRESS SUPPLIED.

Faraday: well done, lass!

Sir,—Thank you, BBC, and thank you very warmly, Faraday School, for giving the public its first truthful glimpse of the comprehensive millennium in full swing. My own school is just like that: often worse and more frightening. The pity is that the bravery of the staff shown in the film is not likely to be repeated.

The silly comments in some of the letters you published will see to that, silly comments about the whereabouts of heads of department, for instance. Where should they be but teaching some probably equally revolting class, perhaps half a mile away?

Silly comments about inexperience, foreignness and sarcasm, too. Probationers have to go in at the deep end: there is no other end to go in.

The head of department is there too, giving his own version of gibbering helplessness. I know: I am one. All members of my department take their share of hell. If they didn't some would have too much for any human being to stand, and our breakdown record would be even worse than it is. Age and experience are factors to be discounted except where their possessors are also large, powerful and aggressive. I am, thank God.

As for the sarcastic young teacher: well done, lass! At least she will survive. That is number one priority, and no one should be allowed to try and talk her out of it. Nor should comprehensive reorganization be allowed to wriggle off the hook. My own foul school is an amalgam of several sec. mods. and a grammar, all good. That seems to be the common pattern.

D. M. T. JONES,
134 Earlham Green Lane, Norwich.

Sir,—Most of us are by now heartily sick of all the talk about "that Panorama programme". I certainly do not wish to continue the debate on whether it was balanced or prejudiced, whether it was timed to be produced at the same time as the Black Paper. These seem to me irrelevant in relation to one major issue which I have not, so far, seen debated.

What is the effect of showing to millions of viewers young men and women in their boredom and truculence and rudeness—not on the viewers but on the actors. Has the experience of the glare of publicity on the child participants helped them or damaged them? Are they proud of their camera image or ashamed or indifferent?

I find it difficult to imagine that the experience could be of value to most of them. I do not believe they can have remained indifferent. Exposure to publicity even for achieving excellence in sport or music or chess or quiz programmes is a dangerous form of experience even for well-balanced and happy thirteen or fourteen-year-olds.

Before we venture further in experiments of this kind let us think hard and inquire widely into the short term and the long term effects of using specific young people, who are individuals, to appear to assume the role of the stereotype of their generation.

I have a feeling that this is playing with fire in an activity about which we know little.

These particular pupils were where they were under the compulsion of the law. What will their parents and their teachers think of all this in six months' or in six years' time?

L.e.a.s lax on workers' rights

Sir,—The efforts of Dr Eric Briault, now installed as a visiting professor at Sussex University, to increase awareness among educational administrators of new employment protection legislation is most welcome. This will reinforce the work of the Local Authorities Conditions of Service Advisory Board, which has emphasized the necessity of education and other services considering the policy issues.

However, your leading article, which stresses the risk of a bureaucracy becoming obsessed with staff welfare and relationships (April 8), might usefully have included some comment on the slowness of some authorities and their negotiating bodies in recognizing the new rights embodied in legislation such as the Employment Protection Act, the Trade Union and Labour Relations Act, and the Health and Safety at Work Act. There is evidence of some services regarding the new laws on the rights of employees in a surprisingly lax way.

Surely no reasonable employer, whether in private industry or local authority services, need worry unduly if they observe good practice and statutory rights. Written statements of particulars of employment, well drafted disciplinary rules, and grievance procedures ought to be the hallmark of a good authority.

I suspect that the new laws are exposing the very soggy and inefficient muddle which is feared to be threatened by new laws. The cosy powers of administrators that have prevailed in the past are being challenged not out of blind disregard for children, or to protect bad teachers and others in service, but to improve relationships and to define better how unions and employers can observe better employment standards.

Grist to the Post Office mill

Sir,—Cannot your advertisers be persuaded to reduce their reliance on printed forms of application? I much resent spending an extra 13p on every job I apply for—a recent advertisement solicited 200 replies for a Scale 1 post, or £26 entirely unnecessary income for the Post Office. It could even become part of the weeding-out process for candidates to have to provide information in a complete, concise and comprehensible form.

Graeco-Roman roots for Europe's schoolmen

Sir,—In his article in your Extra on Muslim education, "In the Beginning was the Word" (April 2), James Dickie writes: "The first European universities sprang up in those countries adjacent to Islam: Italy and Spain"; he then lists the six earliest universities in those countries.

This ignores the University of Paris, whose charter dates from 1200, making it second in order after Bologna. The third Lateran Council, 1179, had ruled that every cathedral must provide a teacher to teach its clerics, and the University of Paris developed out of the Episcopal School of Paris with faculties of arts, canon law, medicine and theology.

He continues: "The disputatio and the scholastic method beloved of the schoolmen were part and parcel of the madrasas." True, but they were also part and parcel of the European tradition of education as handed down from the Graeco-Roman world.

The language of instruction was Latin, and it was Charlemagne's realization that scribes often did not understand their Latin originals which led him to call in foreign scholars. Chief of these was Alcuin of York, a sample of whose question and answer method may be found in the dialogue between Albinus (ie, Alcuin) and Pepin.

This tradition persisted in the West under teachers like Abelard (1079-1142). But we may certainly claim that there were Islamic influences, for example, in the tenth century when Gerbert, later Pope Sylvester II, studied Arabic books in Catalonia and when Amalfi encouraged scholarly discussions between Christians, Muslims and Jews.

It was such cooperation that brought a breath of fresh air into European education, just as the influx of Greek scholars from Byzantium later brought new ideas into Italy.

Heads need more power...

Sir,—How sad that George Walker ("Share power, heads told", April 1) should be overwhelmed in his new headship by the independence and autonomy which is his Hertfordshire inheritance from John Newsom's pioneering vision.

His suggestion of l.e.a. agreed syllabuses, and advisory groups of teachers and employers for curriculum and evaluation, is a certain recipe for inhibiting the school-based curriculum innovation which will alone carry comprehensive schools into a new, coherent phase. The need is for the arts of leadership, not the mediocrities of committee bureaucracy.

In any case, the power of the head is more apparent than real, as Frank Musgrove pointed out some years ago. The head who comes the old force majeure a bit too often will soon get his come uppance in these participatory days—and rightly so. And if George Walker takes a look at his school's articles of government, he will find that ultimate responsibility for staff appointment and promotion lies not with him, as he claims, but with his governors.

It is arguable, indeed, that in curriculum and disciplinary matters heads need more, not less, power. If power without responsibility is harlotry, responsibility without power is impotence.

The kind of headship George Walker seeks already exists—in France and West Germany, where there is central control and all the apparatus of approved textbooks and reviewed contracts. But all the German heads and staff I have spoken to look longingly at the opportunities he is so eager to forfeit.

The idea of five-year contracts for heads is not new. Apart from the more obvious objections, the system would encourage heads to play safe and avoid long-term change; once again, curriculum development would suffer. American school superintendents contract for their services in this way, and simply float from one school board to another, making sure all the while of a stable base of political support. This is another suggestion which would bring no educational advantage, only needless upheaval and myopic management.

I am not suggesting that the present system is beyond improvement; only that George Walker has rather resoundingly missed the point. It was, after all, only a few short weeks ago that the DES told us the most important single factor in its 10 good schools was the headteacher. The next step is to recognize that heads are, at present, almost entirely lacking any pattern of advisory or consultancy help.

What heads need is not less power, but more school-focused assistance with whole curriculum planning and implementation. Then, far from finding his power an embarrassment, the newly appointed head would discover how valuable it was when used, paradoxically, as sparingly as possible in order to discharge his paramount responsibility for curriculum leadership and management.

... until they fall out with staff

Sir,—Your correspondent, John L. Stibbs (April 8) sounds an excellent head and I recommend myself to his notice should one of his deputies feel the strain. However, would it not be possible for him to venture into the classroom if the timetable allowed his deputies to teach at different times from himself? The deputies could then gain valuable experience dealing with internecine staff while the head taught the pupils for which he was originally trained.

I wonder what advice your correspondent would proffer when the head falls out with staff who often have not the courage to face the conflict. Since October 20, 1976, the head of English at a school in the borough, without consultation or explanation from the head, has been forbidden to have direct access to the library ancillary, who for the previous five years was available for departmental typing and other duties.

Among other bugbears this has resulted in no English books being ordered this academic year since the head refuses to allow the ancillary who previously always did this, or the secretarial staff, to type the order. The head of English went to the deputy director of education on October 22, 1976, but the matter still remains unresolved, with the head presumably gaining some inner warmth at witnessing a major department inconvenienced. Quis custodiet ipsos custodes?

My revered guru, Len Cooper, certainly reemphasizes the crux not least since a large percentage of the actual paperwork done by senior colleagues, with equal or better competence, would be achieved by qualified ancillaries. The Peter principle remains of vital importance in schools and causes inexperienced teachers under pressure to teach inadequately while the experienced teachers enjoy administration.

I recognize the absolute need for faultless administration of our schools but plead that our colleagues who occupy the corridors of power, and who decide our fates, should use their powers to investigate thoroughly and disinterestedly what senior colleagues actually do with their hours outside the classroom and then to employ more ancillaries to do it under their direction. It is possible that better teaching and less internecine relationships would occur both inside and outside the classroom.

Life in the dead language yet

Sir,—An iota sub or ad-script to Elisabeth Henry's excellent letter, "Classics: no need to be apologetic" (April 1). The number of summer schools in Ancient Greek up and down the country, invariably oversubscribed, the flourishing adult evening classes in some areas (I think especially of the City Literary Institute, surely one of the most exciting places in the country), and the response which we have had over the past two years to our appeals for sixth forms and universities to test the trial material of the Joint Association of Classical Teachers' Greek course (let alone the entirely private raising of the money for the project in the first place), all suggest that there is an increasing interest in and demand for Ancient Greek among maturer students, and that teachers are determined to see that the demand is met.

We should not be complacent (and here follow a number of exhortations to roll up our noses, put our sleeves to the grindstone, and so on), but belabouring the inspectorate is a bit like flogging a sponge. Let teachers join JACT or their local classical associations (and schools associations) or start them up. There are a lot of ideas about, dying to be put into practice.

In triplicate

Sir,—While I have every sympathy for Miranda Corder (April 8) who changed schools three times in three years and spent three years reading and re-reading Lord of the Flies, she may have some compassion for the writer who, prewar spent 12 years in one school but nevertheless "did" the Acts of the Apostles three years in succession with three successive Scripture mistresses until finally released by the option of Scripture or Latin in the School Certificate.

Sex change in the sixth?

Sir,—In her article, "Who is Liberated Now" (April 1), Maggie O'Connor rightly observes that little research has been done into "the way teachers of either sex interact with their pupils". However, I recall a footnote in a book by Professor Frank Musgrove which indicated that there was some evidence that girls with male teachers in the sixth form obtained better results than girls who were taught by women.

There are, of course, a number of possible interpretations of this data. Melanie Klein, I recall, expressed the view that opposite-sex teachers enabled pupils to sublimate their sexuality (a more scientific concept than "sexism") and use the energy freed for work.

On this view, one would look to further research to examine the hypothesis that women teachers promoted higher measurable achievement in sixth-form males than male teachers.

Middleton, Lancs.

Let's go down to the CEE again

Sir,—For too long, there was a gap in the sixth-form timetable. What could we offer to the increasing number of 16-plus students who wanted to stay on for an extra year, but could not respond to the narrow academic demands of the O level syllabus?

We struggled to plug the gaps, attempting to encourage them to improve CSE grades, or struggling to get them through the O level syllabus. Occasionally they would get the CSE Grade 1 they wanted, and, even more rarely, they could get an O level pass. For the rest, even more failure.

Then, three years ago, this unhappy situation changed, with the long awaited coming of the CEE. Here at last was the exam that both students and teachers wanted. It fulfilled all our needs and expectations. With CEE's broad-based, but searching syllabus, our students had the opportunity to extend their knowledge in ways never offered before, and to achieve a good qualification.

To our dismay, just as the exam was on the verge of being officially recognized it seems that it may be snatched away from us. What is to replace it? Are we to return to the old days, with teachers struggling to fit their "round peg" students into the "square hole" syllabus? What a deeply depressing thought.

We, therefore, exhort all teachers who feel as we do to join us in writing to Shirley Williams, insisting that she "Recognize the CEE".

Berks win all their games at festival

by Stanley Levenson

An educational experience rather than a sports jamboree—this was the aim and achievement of the festival of football organized by the English Schools' Football Association at the Derbyshire Miners' Holiday Camp, Skegness, last week.

The festival, which ended on Sunday, involved more than 1,100 older schoolboys and teachers—in county contingents—in a huge programme of football matches (more than 135), discussions and seminars.

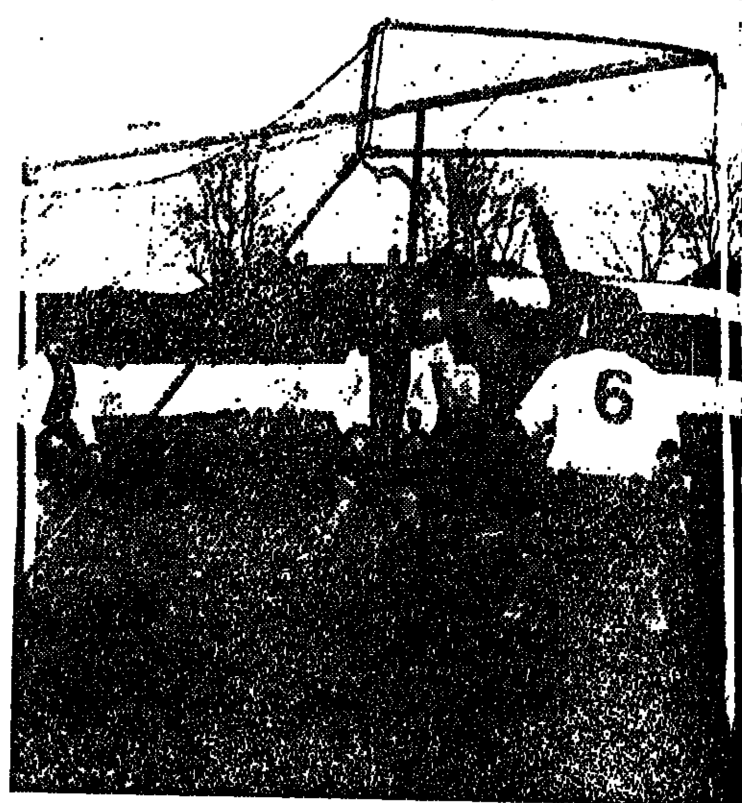
The principal theme was building up bonds of friendship in an educational atmosphere, says Mr D. C. Palmer, chairman of the organizing committee, and chairman-elect of the ESFA. Mr Palmer, who is head of St Clement Danes Grammar School, West London, says the festival helped to develop friendly teacher-pupil relationships.

Television and other media, which often portray a bad picture of schools and young people, should have gone to Skegness to see "how great these boys are, if we look after them".

Although there is a lot of football there are no champions, runners up, cup winners or losers—this would be the antithesis of the festival aims. But the football is treated seriously and standards are "levelling up", say officials.

It is an achievement, in these circumstances, for any county to go through the week undefeated, but five of the fifty did so—Berkshire, Derbyshire, Notts, Inner London and South Yorkshire. Berkshire were the only team to win all five.

One of the hazards of playing football along the east coast are the sudden strong winds. These may have had an unsettling effect on the team from the Rhineland, which had a hard time of it. They lost one match 10—0.



Inner London score in their 1-0 defeat of Yorkshire (light strip).

Handicapped play five-a-side

Girls, and the physically handicapped, will have a place in a new five-a-side football competition announced by the National Association of Youth Clubs with something more tangible than a blessing from Sunblest, the bread people.

There will be four categories of competition—girls, junior boys, senior boys and the physically handicapped and able-bodied (PHABs) with regional finals in nine centres from the end of this month until mid-June. The finals will be at the Sobell Centre, London, on November 4.

Dr Dennis Pegram, the sports adviser to the NAYC, says the PHABs football is touching and stimulating. The handicapped children are pushed in their wheelchairs by able-bodied boys, and the enthusiasm and determination is so great that more than a few chairs "get mangled in the excitement".

The aim of all this, apart from competition and fun, is to raise money for the NAYC and particularly its Avon Tyrrell holiday and training centre near Burley, in the New Forest, Hampshire.

Deaf boy rides to the top on his motor-cycle

by Asif Khan

Christopher Witts, a 13-year-old deaf and dumb schoolboy motor cyclist, gave a remarkable display of skill and determination when he won a major scrambling event during the Easter break.

Christopher, who attends Oak Lodge School, Hythe, Hampshire, held off a strong challenge from 38 other riders in the intermediate class to take the title at the Allied National Charity Scramble in aid of the Muscular Dystrophy Fund.

The event, which was organized by the Midland Schoolboy Scrambling Club, attracted more than 200 young motor cyclists in five classes. It was held in the grounds of Ragley Hall, the seventeenth century Warwickshire mansion of the Marquess of Hertford.

The five classes were cadets, aged under eight, riding 50cc machines; juniors, seven to 11, 80cc machines; intermediates, 11 to 13, 100cc machines; seniors, 13 to 15, 125cc machines, and experts, 15 to 17, also 125cc machines.

The mile-and-a-half long hilly course with its many hazards seemed to present little difficulty to the riders, who included four girls who competed under same rules and conditions as the boys.

David Thorpe, the reigning national schoolboy champion, of Garth Hill School, Bracknell, Berkshire, took the experts' event to strengthen his claim to be the best young rider in the country. Philip Small, Court Hill School, Farnham, Hampshire, won the seniors', and Wayne Howell, Minor Norton School, near Bilston, Staffordshire, the juniors'. Darren Malin, Stoney Gate College, Cheshire, was the top cadet.

Dawn Guy, St Mary's School, Brierley Hill, Worcestershire, and Karen Witts, Wild Ground junior, Hythe, were the outstanding girl riders and reached the finals of their classes.

New awards for young canoeists

The British Schools Canoeing Association has launched a new awards scheme but this one, unlike the scheme they introduced three years ago, is based on the recreative use of kayaks and canoes.

Known as the Expedition awards, they are divided into three categories—the adventure award, which is the starter, the exploror and the voyageur. The aim is "to encourage young people in school and youth groups to undertake purposeful journeys by canoe after appropriate training has taken place and full preparations made".

The BSCA says the adventure award does not make big demands and would be suitable for pupils on RSLA activities. There are three requirements before an adventurer's badge and certificate can be earned: passing the British Canoe Union elementary test; completing at least 20 "journey hours", none of which should be less than one hour; planning, preparing and completing a trip of at least 10 miles for a specified purpose.

The demands from potential voyageurs are much tougher. They include passing some strict river and sea tests of the BCU and planning and completing a five-day canoe camping expedition, using at least three different sites.

In all this the supervisory responsibility of teachers and youth leaders is pretty obvious. Details from Mr M. J. Baines, 71 Woodcote Road, Birmingham B24 0HA.

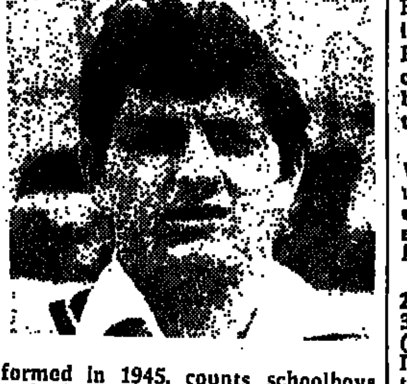
Best cricket all-rounder

Ian Payne, who captained Emanuel School last season, has been named by The Cricket Society as the best all-rounder in public schools representative cricket in 1976. He received the Wetherell Award from the society's president, Mr E. W. Swanton, at their spring dinner in London last week.

The award was instituted in 1967 in memory of R. S. C. Wetherell, a member of the Repton XI of 1918. In his will he provided for annual awards to outstanding all-rounders in English first-class cricket, public schools representative cricket and Repton school.

Payne, who has been signed up by Surrey as a young professional at The Oval, topped both the batting and bowling averages in public school games with 1,144 runs in 24 innings and 79 wickets for an average of 8.68. His highest score of the season was 143.

The Cricket Society, which was formed in 1945, counts schoolboys and Test cricketers among its 2,000-plus members who are scattered throughout the world. It claims to be the largest, most comprehensive and active organization of its kind.



England win

England won the schools home internationals fencing crown in Edinburgh at the weekend on the combined results of the girls' and boys' under-18 and under-16 contests.

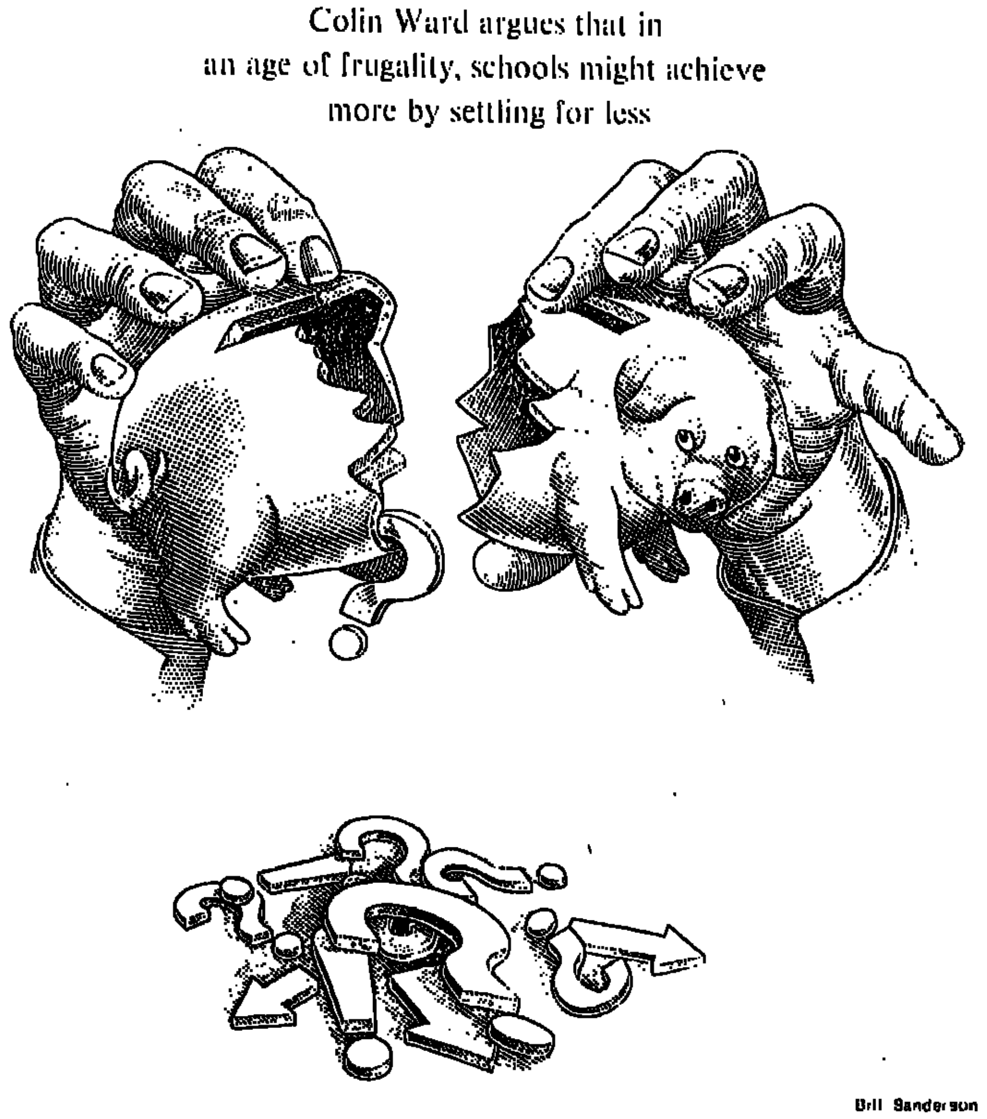
England and Scotland both beat Wales and Ireland and victory went to the English on total fights won over the Scots after they had drawn at two events each in both matches. Results:—

England Under-18 beat Scotland 2—2 (33 to 30 fights), beat Wales 3—0. Under-16 beat Scotland 2—2 (40—23), beat Wales 2—0, beat Ireland 3—0. Total five international matches won and 12 events.

Scotland Under-18 beat Wales 3—0. Under-16 beat Wales 2—0, beat Ireland 3—0. Three matches won, 12 events. Ireland Under-18 beat Wales 2—0. One match victory, two events. Wales 0.

Towards a poor school

Colin Ward argues that in an age of frugality, schools might achieve more by settling for less



Bill Sanderson

There is an irony in telling teachers that the big-spending days are over. Many went through the boom years without even knowing they were in them. They found themselves committed to a policy of make do and mend as usual, and never put their hands on the money because it was being spent somewhere else.

They would say all year that they needed this or that set of books or piece of equipment and would be told there was no cash. Three days before the end of the financial year, the head of department would say: "You've got £400 to spend by the end of the week. Let me know what to order before the end of the afternoon, because otherwise we'll lose the money."

I was in a school the other day, in an art and design department, where thousands of pounds were available to spend on machinery, but the art teacher had only £38 to lay out on paper, paint and other expendibles. He could have kilns, but no clay.

As an advocate of the use of the local environment in education, I have often come across the teachers who can easily get an illuminated terrestrial globe to suspend from the ceiling, but find it out of order to buy a class set of street maps of the locality.

One of the ways in which hierarchical systems work is by withholding information on the budget. We see this at a national level, where the Chancellor has it all in his box to reveal to a waiting nation on budget day. There is a fetish of secrecy. But why should not the nation's budget be the subject of earnest discussion throughout the country for months before?

It is the same with the education budget and the budget of the school itself. I am willing to join in the scramble for slices of the diminishing cake, but which group of supplicants, all shouting "Me too", do I join?

I would rather join a different campaign. The graffiti on my wall would say "Open the Books". Just what is the school's budget, and how is it to be allocated? What subject interest is starved just because it does not use a lot of prestige equipment? Just what is the authority's education budget, and how much of that goes in administration? Just how much of the nation's education budget is spent by the DES on itself?

Wasn't it hilarious to read in the press, the week before the Prime Minister opened his great debate, that "a multi-million pound emergency programme to monitor standards has been started by the DES" just when the schools themselves were being obliged to make multi-million pound cuts in their spending?

A year ago, John Vaizey asked: "Do we really need the DES?" What function has it, he asked, when the education authorities themselves have inspectors and advisers, and when we have a decentralized system without central control of the curriculum? If you took a conspiratorial view of politics you would think that the Yellow Paper was the department's attempt to assert in the face of Lord Vaizey that it has a function, or was determined to make one for itself.

One thing that we know from the boom years—the calculation was made for the United States by Everett Reimer, for this country by the Fabian paper Labour and Inequality, and for most countries in the world by Michael Huberman in his suppressed UNESCO report of 1970—is that the greater the sums of money that are poured into the education industries of the world, the smaller the proportion which benefits the people at the bottom of the educational, occupational and social hierarchy. The universal education system turns out to be yet another way in which the poor are obliged to subsidize the rich.

Today, in the scramble for dwindling public expenditure on education, you may be sure the universities are going to be almost obscenely successful by comparison with the pre-school education lobby, one of the areas most at risk when education authorities trim their budgets.

In the boom years, both here and in the United States, education was oversold. Every additional bit of expenditure, every increase in student numbers at the upper and more expensive end of the system, every new development in educational technology, was a step towards some great social goal. But it has not delivered the goods.

The pathos of the battle for equality in education is that it revolved around the principle of equality of opportunity to be unequal. The last word on this subject was said, way back in the 1950s, in a modest little book disguised as a satire, Michael Young's The Rise of the Meritocracy.

Early this year, 20 years after that book was written, Michael Young said in an interview in the Sunday Times, "I think secondary schools in their present form are doomed. They haven't yet managed to reflect the new kind of family. The father used to be the fount of authority. Today that authority is greatly diminished, partly because it is shared. Schools and universities borrowed authority from the authoritarian father and now that it is no longer there to be borrowed, children in secondary schools are not going to accept it.

"There has to be a reduction in the school-leaving age and a move over to half-time education. People will be learning at home, at the workplace, and not forced into institutions which use a bogus authority."

Michael Young has the honesty and poor taste to bring up the subject of the crisis of authority in the secondary school: a crisis that ensures that much of our expenditure on teachers and plant is wasted by attempting to teach people what they do not want to learn in a situation that they would rather not be in. A poor school could not afford such waste and frustration of both teachers and taught.

The school has become one of the instruments by which we exclude adolescents from real responsibilities and real functions in the life of our society. We have in the last years of secondary schooling pathetic attempts to give "relevance" by providing work experience courses, aimed at acclimatizing the young to the shock of going to work, or by running courses in colleges of further education with such titles as adjustment to work, for the benefit of those unable or unwilling to hold down a job.

Arthur Young, the head of Northcliffe High School in Yorkshire, has for years been trying to find the right equation between earning and learning. He values the efforts of his pupils to earn money for themselves and has sought, within the narrowly prescribed limits of the law, to provide opportunities in and out of school for them to do so.

He remarks of work experience projects that they "have never really got off the ground because of the legal, insurance and trade union problems that hedge them round. I have always thought that the schemes proposed were phoney—the most important aspect of work experience being neglected completely—the wage at the end of the week".

Describing efforts made to provide cash-earning experiences for the most unlikely lads at his school, and the effect it has had on their attitudes to running their own lives, taking decisions, budgeting, fulfilling obligations, dealing with strangers, as well as such mundane things, taken for granted by the middle-class child, as using the telephone, he remarks:

"We have to overcome the ridiculous idea that giving children the chance to earn money in school is somehow immoral. . . . In the changing situation in education, pupil-teacher relationships and roles are the essence of much heart-searching and debate. We might do well to compare the differences in an earning-learning situation between master and apprentice and in the traditional school situation, captive scholars facing chalk and talk across the barrier of the teacher's desk. The comparison of relationships between newsagent and paperboy and between paperboy and schoolmaster might also be revealing."

The carelessly rich school, greedy for resources, has no need to be a productive institution. The poor school could not afford not to be a productive workshop, and belongs with the idea of a society in which every workshop is an effective school.

Don't think I am denigrating or downgrading the teacher. Far from it. A poor school could not afford to have its spending kept out of the individual teacher's hands. A poor school needs to know what it is paying for. In the 1960s educational spenders were swept along on a tide of commercially inspired expensive options like programmed learning and teaching machines which are greeted with a cynical laugh in the 1970s. The expensive hardware has become an irrelevancy and an embarrassment in this decade.

If the teacher is really a professional, the school should have a clearly stated published budget with a personal allocation to each member of staff to spend as he or she sees fit. Teachers should be responsible for their own spending, and should be able to do it wisely or foolishly, pooling their allocation if they want to, or carrying it over to next year.

The poor school would be self-catering. Why shouldn't responsibility for meals be in the hands of the pupils? Why shouldn't every secondary school include a day nursery run by the pupils? The poor school would be too valuable a community asset to be open for a small part of the day and for a restricted age band.

Already we are groping towards such an institution through the efforts to evolve community schools and community colleges. When we consider how little the huge educational spending of the last decade did to enhance the lives or life-chances of the children in what is known as the "lower quartile of the ability range" in secondary education, we may hope that the new age of frugality will lead us to devise appropriate educational experiences in a climate where we make fewer grandiose claims for what the school can do. By settling for less, we might even achieve more.

Colin Ward edits the Bulletin of Environmental Education. This article is based on an address being given today at the Dartington Society conference on New Themes for Education.

What we might become

Geoffrey Summerfield reviews a 'passionately intelligent manifesto' which puts forward proposals for a new kind of college*

Peter Abbs and Graham Carey have come up with a modest proposal for a "new" form of tertiary education. Many aspects of it are radical in the sense of being rooted in the past, but they are also mediated in such a way that they are "made new".

In the past I have had severe reservations about Peter Abbs's educational beliefs: after reading Proposal, I will want to dissent, but my disagreements are more a matter of emphasis, tone, and detail: in general, I think he and Graham Carey have produced a passionately intelligent manifesto. I applaud it, and hope that, sooner rather than later, some education authority will provide them with the opportunity to put their ideas into practice.

Their book is usefully brief, and does not waste words. They begin by examining the symptoms of folly and of vulgarity that characterized educational decision making in the 1960s—the craving for size, the megalomaniacal campus, the cult of tertiary education as trendy, fun, accessibly easy and easily accessible. But their main concern is with the colleges of education, and these they find, in general, lamentable.

They cite an early essay by L. C. Knights (Scrutiny 1932) on the passive conformity and docility, the uncritical stance, of college students, and suggest that the same criticism can be levelled against most such students today—"the vast majority of students do not become passionately identified with or absorbed by their studies". Abbs and Carey do not see the new Diploma in Higher Education as a convincing step in the right direction. Passionate identification, passionate absorption—they often return to this central question.

They insist that the crucial questions in any of our lives "cannot begin to be answered or even (at the moment) adequately comprehended by the scientific disciplines. They can only be elaborated, celebrated, explored and interpreted through the symbolic and communal discourse of art and through a continuous study of the humanities, humanely conceived".

Their account of the bankruptcy of prevailing notions of knowledge takes in the darker effects of the scientific revolution and of Western technology, and of the convenient adjuncts, mechanistic and functional notion of human beings: here they refer us to those poignant lines of Darwin's Autobiography, where he speaks his mind as having become "a kind of machine for grinding general laws out of large collections of facts".

Such desiccation is not peculiar to the scientific areas of the academic enterprise; they could just as usefully have cited the equally devastating account of the dreariness of the PhD arts conventions offered by Geoffrey Durrant's essay, "The New Barbarians".

The deadening hand of our dunces and pedants is not to be found only in the "hard" sciences: English in schools, for example, seems to be about to enter another Dark Age in the name of a fetichistic and hollow totem called "academic rigour". If the forms of knowledge that have dominated education for the past century are inadequate or perverting, where then are we to look for convincing and sufficient alternatives?

The authors look to some specific antecedents, some relatively remote, others more recent: Fountains Abbey and Ailred's Rievaulx; Ruskin College; Gropius's Bauhaus; and Rice's Black Mountain College—all, in their various ways, brave experiments in the establishing of a creative community, a "good place".

Each of these institutions had its peculiar strengths, and some had glaring weaknesses, either circumstantial (it was a pity that Olson had to assume control of Black Mountain—running anything other than an enjambement was not his strength) or inherent in some initial flaw or oversight or bias. Each flowered, and each in some degree can be said to have died.

Abbs and Carey clearly warm to Ailred of Rievaulx and they also draw heavily on the writings of Lewis Mumford. It is all the more surprising, therefore, that they do not at least touch on Mumford's diagnosis of the "failure" of the monastic tradition—that it was better at withdrawing from the world, in search of spiritual, intellectual, and communal blessings, than it was at re-entering the world to offer the fruits of such blessings.

One of my reservations about the emphasis in Proposal is precisely to do with its emphasis on intimacy and continuity: "The best education is secured where demanding studies are grounded in a student-tutor relationship sustained over a number of years."

Well . . . yes, and, then again, no! I think of tutors—and perhaps they also can think of cases—with whom one tutorial or one seminar is really more than enough. But then, the authors argue, their college will recruit really distinguished teachers—people for whom teaching is a secondary activity—painters who also teach proto-painters.

Well . . . yes, of course. If one is establishing a small utopian community of severely restricted numbers, one can perhaps recruit such distinguished teachers.

The main reservation I have about this part of the book has to do with the degree to which the monastic ideal, with its totally cohering ideology, cosmology, theology, not to mention its theocracy, is transferable in any useful sense; and the degree to which the authors almost (but not quite) blur and soften the sharp edges of some of the internecine controversies that marred the work of both the Bauhaus and Black Mountain: the problem, to put it crudely, of reconciling the powerful, even manic, energies of the creative individual and the needs or claims of community.

Abbs and Carey set up a contrast between civilization and community. Civilization — techno-Benthamite-industrial-bureaucratized-civilization — has foundered: our present hope of regeneration lies in community, in "the cultural community". To establish what they mean by "the cultural community" they invoke anthropological and cultural critique notions of the "primitive" society with its organic and sustaining nexus of religio-social-spiritual-artistic rituals and pieties, iconographies and symbolisms.

In a rather heavy-handed footnote they cleanse the term "primitive" of its pejorative suggestions by invoking the co-existence, in art, of extreme technical finesse and "primitive energies". The distinction they draw between the work of Henry Moore and the Mexican icon, Chac Mool, strikes me as unconvincing; but Moore could have served their purpose well if they had thought to quote his words, on the subject of his telluric, not to say cthonic, etchings of Stonehenge: "Mystery plays a large and enlivening part in our lives: not knowing but wanting to know, wondering and guessing, questioning and exploring."

The section on community deserves close attention, if only because its roots, psychologically speaking, seem to be pretty close to sanity and wholeness: they find room both for "wise passivity" and for energetic action, for tranquillity and for passion.

Psychic health is close to the centre of their concern, and anything that offers positive alternatives in this matter is worth having: a way forward between the Scylla of privatised solipsistic soul-message, and the Charybdis of depersonalized, institutionalized "functioning".

I am grateful for their quotations from Kathleen Raine's The Land Unknown, especially when she speaks of "the athletes of the spirit" who attempt "to advance our humanity somewhat in the direction of what we might become."

Similarly, I warm to their own brave words, in their account of modern dance as practised by such a master as Merce Cunningham and his company—"performing marvellously at the boundary of human possibility and control, placing themselves at high aesthetic risk, at a critical level of personal honesty".

They convey something of the exhilaration of watching the great executant artist, in whatever art, and also imply that cry of the heart/soul: if only one's own work were always characterized by such coherence, intensity, and passion.

Perhaps the central value of the author's case here is that they find a place for a larger and more complex "life" than can be contained under the exclusive heading of "intellect". The "passionate identification" and "absorption" are to be achieved, felt, as "transcendence" through processes of making. This seems to me peculiarly important: a purely critical discipline will no longer serve our needs, if indeed it ever did.

The book concludes with the question of the day-to-day survival of their college, "the self-managing community": it is economically and ecologically sensitive and sensible, and demonstrates Ruskin's point that economics is far too sensitive and humanly significant a subject to be left to the economists—most of them, anyway, those walking pocket-calculators, those "clever" fools.

Abbs and Carey have some justly hard knocks to offer our current extravagances in all our tertiary institutions: 141 administrative and domestic staff in a college of education of 800 students; and the Oxbridge tradition of pampered negligence. Their college "will employ no middle-aged servants to wait on the young at table, no servants to clean boots, make beds, dust rooms, no old women will scrub the stairs and corridors as students pass by holding their books, discussing Marxism". This needs to be said, again and again.

Abbs and Carey's students will "do for themselves": echoes of the great building-venture at Black Mountain, when faculty and students left their classrooms every afternoon and built their new extensions with their own bare hands; echoes, too, of the visions of Ruskin's Fors Clavigera, and of Makarenko's Road to Life. They serve to remind us that radically creative, radically communal experiments in education—especially tertiary education—can be numbered on the fingers of one hand.

So, who makes the next move? Abbs and Carey have flung this vivid and lively gauntlet down at the door of the DES. It is too late to carp and to shrug shoulders and to mutter, "Utopian nonsense!" The ball is now in the court of the mandarins. God forbid that they should be so unironically committed to the mythologizing and masquerading of the Great Debate as to pass this little bombshell of a book straight from their in tray to their out tray, without at least pretending to listen.

Charles Hannam recalls some moments in his childhood when, as Karl Hartland, the son of a wealthy Jewish banker, he attended school in Nazi Germany

There was a problem about the gymnasium for Karl; a Jewish quota had been introduced, only 10 per cent of the children in the school were allowed to be Jewish.

The Jewish quota was not the only thing that made Karl realize life was changing. Jewish shops had their windows smashed in; he saw them in the town centre. They had broken glass and stars of David painted with whitewash on the remains of the window. And even where the windows had not been smashed, printed posters had been stuck on saying "Germans defend yourselves, don't buy from Jews". Usually this happened where the name of the shopkeeper was obviously Jewish. Karl was learning what were Jewish names and what were not. They were sometimes odd names like Rosenzweig or Herzberg, but most often common ones like Cohen.

In the classroom the new form-teacher introduced himself. "If you want to know anything or are in any sort of trouble come to me", he said. He had hair cut very short and a little bit stood up like a brush, or perhaps like a handgrip to pull him out of the water if he was drowning. He wore a button with a swastika on it in his lapel buttonhole.

"I must now make up the register and get to know you all." "Hartland", he said when he came to Karl. "The banker? Are you Jewish?"

"Yes."

"What a pity. I had hoped for a completely Aryan class. Oh well."

The same conversation took place when another pupil, Ernst Karpf, gave his name. Karl hated him, his big nose, his unheroic manner and the fact that his father worked in a bank as well, the bank that belonged to the other Hartlands. He felt sure that without this companion all would have been well and the Jewish quota cut to more manageable proportions.

The school was disturbing in a number of ways. The teachers came and went when a period ended; there were enormous staircases; and the hall, true to the tradition of Latin culture the school fostered, was called the aula. Then there was homework, and on top of everything else Karl already realized that he was an outsider. "You a Jew then?" one of the boys said during the break.

The gym lessons at school were grim because Karl could not do the things he was supposed to do. The worst were the wooden bars which went to a giddy height, right up to the ceiling. There were thick ropes as well. "Get up the ropes, you fat pig", said the gym master. "Get up or I will beat you till you do." He supported the threat with a smart cut with a skipping rope on Karl's bottom. "Get up, you fat pig", chorused Karl's classmates, only too pleased to find someone who was useless.

Karl strained at the slippery wooden bar but his hands would not pull him up and his legs were left dangling. Occasionally his feet would hit the bar where his laces went over his instep, which hurt a lot. There was one bony lad, tall, hair cut like the form-master with a little tuft in front, his brown eyes glittering and alert. He was "the best" in the class, answered questions first and somehow his answers were also ones that pleased the teachers. "Jewish pig", he hissed, "you fat, idle, Jewish pig, you can't do anything, you are useless". There was much laughter and the only way out Karl could think of was to pretend that it was all a great act, a joke, done on purpose to make everyone laugh. It did not work and he felt alone and miserable.

National economy and self-sufficiency were the big things at that time. We must not buy "foreign" goods, they said in school. We must raise our own pigs. To that end a big wooden bin was set up in the playground and each boy dutifully brought potato peelings, cabbage stalks and stale bread for the bin. Once or twice a week Karl would bring his load to show that he, too, wanted to help. One day as he approached the bin he saw his classmates in a cluster, they were sticking Karpf into the bin and when his head bobbed up they pushed him down again. Karl disappeared and locked himself in the lavatory until the end of the break, leaving his bag behind. In the classroom the boys were happy and excited. "We tipped your mate into the pig bin", they said and Karl wanted to say that Karpf was not his mate and that he would have liked to have tipped him into the bin as well, but the situation had made Karpf his mate, his fellow sufferer, and this was the worst thing he had to put up with. When the form master breezed in the boys shouted, "We tipped the Yid into the pig bin, Sir." They liked him, he was a friendly man, strict but fair. He nearly laughed, then pulled himself together.

"That was wrong. Hartland and Karpf leave the room." The two crept out and waited in the corridor; not saying a thing to each other. "He told us to be decent to you although you are Jews", they said afterwards.

The school seemed an extraordinary place to Karl. Everything depended on quick, precise and smart answers. "The capital of Greece?" "Athens." "Right." And the teacher would bring a thick notebook out of his pocket and enter a mark. There were two sets of marks, one lot for oral work and the other for written work and at the end of the term there were reports.

Karl's parents waited anxiously for the report and indeed for any sign of success in school. Karl would often report good marks and they would say he was a good boy and at coffee time when his mother's friends were there to eat cream cakes and nourishing little salads Karl would be paraded before them and they would say, "What will you do when you grow up, be a banker like your daddy?" Or they would admonish him to work hard because there was so much anti-semitism in the schools and he must prove how good he was. When they asked if there was any trouble at his school he would say "No" and they would say, "We hear the Karpf boy has a bad time." Karl would answer that he was a special case and they all agreed that the Karpfs were a bunch of stuck-up snobs.

The last report of the year coincided with Karl's birthday and he felt very nervous. He feared there would be no presents if the report was not a good one, and he knew it would not be. The reports were handed out in envelopes and Karl tore his open in the lavatory. Every single mark was "satisfactory" except physical education where, not unreasonably, there was an "unsatisfactory". At the bottom was one single remark, "Precocious". Karl did not quite know what his form master meant by that but he took the report home and if there was disappointment in the family it was not shown.

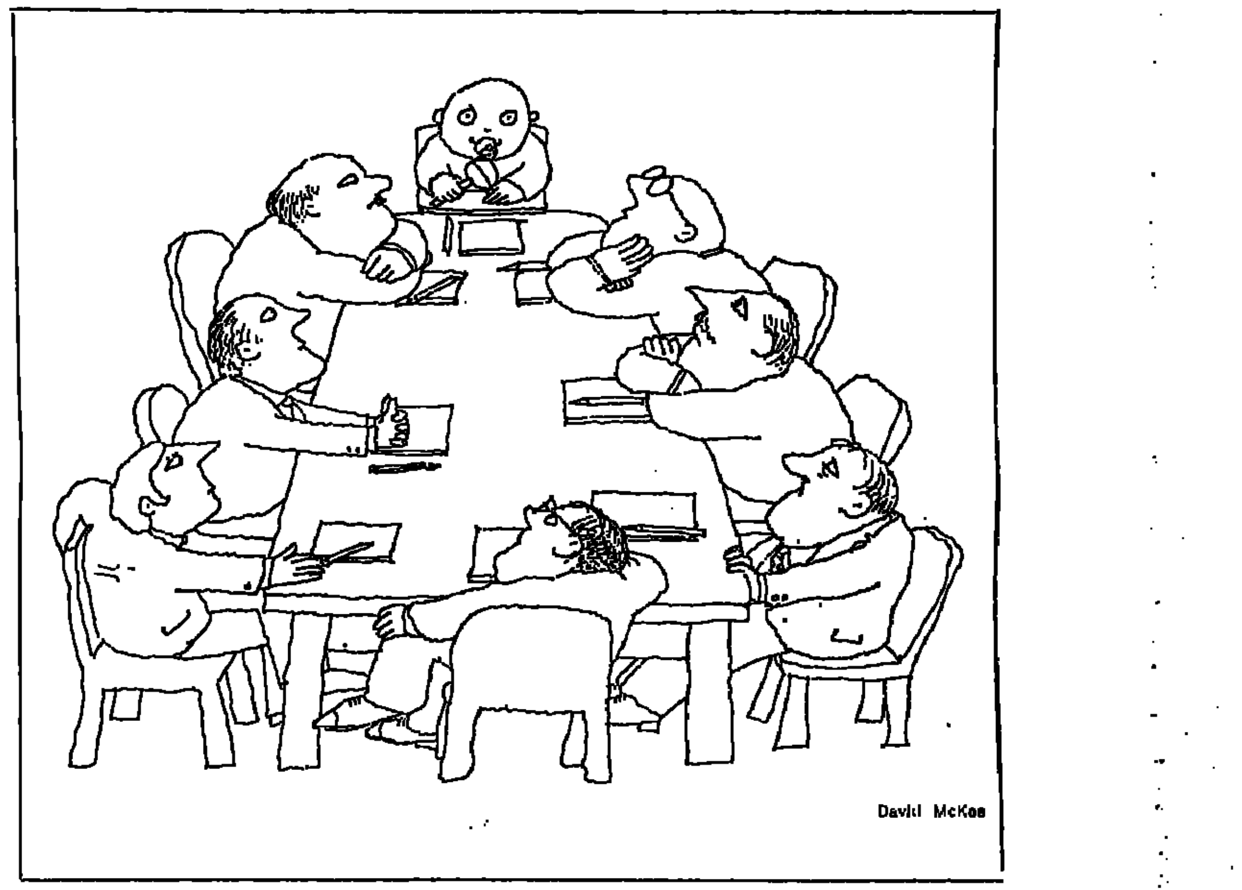
Too young to govern?

Tony Travers believes the DES may be wrong in arguing that pupil governors under 18 are illegal



David McKee

Pupils who are under eighteen should not have a part in running their schools. So, according to one newspaper report, the Department of Education and Science has advised the Taylor Committee, which is now reaching its final conclusions.

This seems an odd recommendation to a committee which may make suggestions about altering the law as it affects school government. It is even more odd when 16-year-olds are allowed to leave school—and therefore judged sufficiently mature to accept the responsibilities of working life—and are held fully responsible for a crime, to marry, to consent to sexual intercourse and to prevent their own name from being changed. Pupils have been governors in many authorities (for example Haringey, Humberside and Wolverhampton) for years without causing civil strife or the collapse of the education system.

Still, the DES holds to its view about the illegality of under-18-year-old governors, basing its case upon two extracts of law and one from Halsbury's laws of England. The first of these is the Law of Property Act, 1925, which states: "The appointment of an infant to be a trustee in relation to any settlement or trust shall be void, but without prejudice to the power to appoint a new trustee to fill the vacancy."

This fails to affect pupils' rights to be governors as there is no need for the governors of a school to be trustees of anything. Even in voluntary schools, the trustees are often not governors, and governors need not be trustees.

The second law quoted by the Department is the Family Law Reform Act, 1969. This merely reduces the general age of majority from 21 to 18, but it does not lay down any rule about what minors or infants can or cannot do. Therefore, unless they are prevented from being governors by some other law, this Act cannot stop anyone from acting as a school governor.

The DES's third piece of evidence against "infant" pupil governors is taken from paragraph 408 of Halsbury's laws of England (a summary of existing English law and case law as it affects different categories of activity). This says: "An infant is under a general incapacity to exercise the rights of citizenship or perform civil duties; or to hold public or private offices or perform the duties incidental to them."

There are several weaknesses here. Is school governorship part of the exercise of the "rights of citizenship"? The phrase civil duties is a very vague one, and the chance that anyone would actually be prevented by a court from acting as a governor on the basis of so vague a statement is pretty remote.

The first part of the paragraph is based upon a court case of 1665, while the second is not supported by any legal authority at all. The part of the Department's case which might have affected the rights of some pupils to be governors appears, then, to rest on the seventeenth-century judgment of Chief Justice of the Common Pleas Orlando Bridgman.

The case decided whether the "infancy of Mary, who is heir of the body of Bryan Stapleton, do hinder her from executing the power of revocation, reserved upon the deed of the heirs of his body, by writing under his or their hands and seals". That is, could the child make a contract or deed in her dead father's name?

The answer was that she could not: "coverture or infancy debar the party, which is under the disability, from making any deed or writing, to dispose of any estate or interest. Littleton, sect. 259, saith,—Before the age of 21 years, if an infant make any grant, obligation, deed, or other writing, all serves for nothing, and may be avoided". The DES might derive meaning from this judgment: it suggests that minors ought not to sign contracts.

A few years earlier, there was a case which has much more bearing on the appointment of minors to a public office. The case was much closer to the present pupil governors dispute. In 1590, the Bishop of Rochester appointed a fresh faced 11-year-old to be register of his diocese on the future death of the incumbent. The appointment was approved by the dean and chapter in June, 1590,

Eventually the incumbent register died, and the (by then) new Bishop of Rochester was left with a register he did not want. Two attempts were made to remove the register (who was now in his 20s) by claiming in court that giving office to an infant was illegal. The judgment given in the English Law Reports, Volume 79, is clear (in the 1640 case) that "this grant of the office in reversion, after the death of tenant for life, to an infant of the age of 11 years exercendum per se vel deputatum sufficientem (as the usual grants are) is good, notwithstanding the infancy".

The justices would have taken this view even if the 11-year-old had taken office immediately, because "he was then of such age as by intendment he might have written the acts and orders, etc, or made election of a sufficient deputy". So even if the "infant" register had not been able to carry out his duties, he could have appointed a deputy to do them for him. What mattered was whether the job was done.

The justices in 1640 backed up their judgment with logical reasoning that: "as an infant may have an office by descent, as to be sheriff, or warden of the Fleet, and the like, which are offices of charge and of trust, so he may have an office by grant. . . . An infant may be a mayor; and the acts by the mayor and commonality shall not be avoided by the nonage of the mayor."

They did feel that there should be some limit of the power of minors: "Where he is of such a tender age that he cannot by intendment execute it by himself, as being an infant of three or four years of age, who hath not the discretion to execute it."

The 1640 case was a repeat of a previous attempt, in 1632, to remove the register. At only one point was the 1632 judgment more precise. This says that the grant of a public office "is not void because at that time he was an infant, or because an infant cannot make a deputy: for an infant who can write and understand the Latin tongue may be a register, and may have sufficient knowledge to write and register acts, which is sufficient for his place, at leastwise he may have sufficient knowledge to make an able deputy; and if he put in one who is inefficient, it is cause of the forfeiture of the office."

School governors and managers in 1977 are not engaged in legal acts. They do not make contracts. Even if they did, the problems of governors and managers under 18 would not be insuperable. They are capable of doing the job. There are, as we have seen, no legal obstacles to pupil governors of any age. Educational bodies have no need to fear another Tameside-type court case about "infant" governors, because they would win.

If there are other reasons for disallowing pupil governors under 18 years old, then the Department should tell the Taylor Committee and the public what they are. Otherwise they should stop trying to dissuade Taylor, local authorities and ministers from extending the numbers of pupil governors. There is no reason why any child in a secondary school should be disallowed from participating in the government of his or her school.

Putting on the styles

Peter Fanning at the twenty-second National Student Drama Festival held at St Andrews

If there was one dominant theme to emerge from the barrage of conflicting styles in this year's National Student Drama Festival it was a general yearning for self-destruction—either as an expression of theatrical despair or by an act of hara-kiri on the altar of New Plays. A diet of four Samuel Beckett programmes (not to mention two mutilated King Lears) should have been enough to send any self-respecting student plunging off the clifftops into the grey North Sea and at least one eminent critic was spotted wandering through the woods, clutching what looked suspiciously like a noose.

Textual murder was fashionable, with Krapp's Last Tape a prime victim for the chop. No-one could have objected to Cambridge ADC transforming this character into a marionette if they had not also chosen to transform the text into solid blocks of concrete. (Dehumanising the script was a popular pastime—ham-fisted monotony passing for rhetoric.) Only occasionally did a sense of Krapp's loss come through.

Newcastle University's presentation of Endgame was set in a semi-demolished house; and the set was the best part about it. Despite all the care lavished on this production (maybe because of it), we soon settled down into two hours of monumental tedium (no interval), as the apocalyptic bell tolled like a sledgehammer. Ken Price and Graham Blockey (Ham and Clov) showed signs of understanding what the play was about, before suffocating in the general plod. Only the last few minutes meant anything.

But as if to remind us that even Beckett need not be so crashingly dull, Hendon College's (Middlesex Polytechnic) Happy Days was a breath of fresh air. Jude Ilett played Winnie, middle aged, middle class, locked in a heap of earth on the seashore, papering over the void with a series of busy nothings. It was a performance of compassionate despair; and although it never plumbed the very depths, her maturity and control showed that the sight of a single actor doing his thing need not be the numbing experience it frequently proved to be. Mike Patterson was also entertaining in a one-man Beckett show, presenting a gangling Shavian tramp with an Irish accent that wandered freely throughout the Northern Midlands.

As for the Lears, both drew inspiration from Oriental theatre. The Cambridge Independent Theatre wore black judo suits; their performance was stylized with patterning and minimal gesture. This method, which had the virtue of making one listen to the words, was presented with strikingly original tableaux—some of which illustrated the text (Lear, stark on a scaffolding heath like a storm-racked Captain Ahab). But a perverse tendency to work against the script and against all audience involvement put the play into a straitjacket from which it never escaped.

Conviction and control saved this metallic production from the sandbanks of disaster. The dead Lear lay like a sawdust Petrushka, while Albany's epilogue "We that are young . . ." seemed to speak of a pageant in an age long past; and having enacted that pageant the troupe would move on. But the play offered nothing but an empty shell. Presenting Lear as a silly old man avoids certain problems of acting the part, but like everything else it merely substitutes a series of negative responses. It is easy enough to assault the senses and signify absolutely nothing: the sight of a man smashing up a piano has a certain elan. This sterile approach was typical of several productions. Non-theatre is all the rage. And this Lear wasted a strong cast, notably Paul Hudson's spiky Fool and Gordon Hammersley's Edmund.

The purpose of Leeds's "Kabuki" Lear was to get the audience rolling in the aisles and then kick them in the teeth in the final scene. Kabuki, my foot. It was Victorian burlesque, with two ugly sisters camping it up and a black cowled ghoul who had lost its way en route for the Coarse Acting auditions. All that was missing were the custard pies and the whole of the Gloucester sub-plot. And it says a good deal for Shakespeare and for Mike Patterson's craggy Lear that the final act redeemed a sense of tragedy from a welter of banalities and conflicting styles.

Nothing is quite so suicidal as a play about not writing a play. Trent Park College's Interrupted Act by the Polish playwright Rozewicz was certainly one of the best designed productions. But the nihilist centre—the writer's own failure—presented continuously diminishing returns. The light comedy style became a shower of confetti and if this was the intention then the play succeeded in much the same way as all the other non-stuff. It isn't exactly live theatre, but it's much more consistent than the self-indulgent rubbish of Durham University's entry, Pushed into it. Actors on acting make pretty dull watching. And this was no exception.

It was left to Tom Stoppard to show what was possible in writing good plays about plays. Warwick University's Rozencrantz and Guildenstern was always entertaining, if not always entirely stylish. Alex Jennings and Paul Chandler were the two attendant lords, caught up in a maze of metaphysical abstractions and as incapable of taking action as Godot's two tramps.

But the old showbiz theme about the tat behind the glamour came in for more treatment in Stephen Jeffreys's play Like Dolls or Angels, staged by Carlisle College. Just to up the stakes a bit, this one is about a stunt man on the verge of success, while his girlfriend risks breaking her back or collapsing under the strain of it all. Tom Potter's Hannigan blended offbeat camp with a grovelling obsession with the Big Time and, though overlong, this play packs a punch. It is one of the very few new plays shown that one could ever imagine being professionally staged.

Meanwhile, it was showbiz nostalgia time with Richard Maher's Rox, a one-man pastiche of the sixties. Jon James gave a bravura performance, distributing liberal doses of acid on everything from Woodstock to bananas (has there ever been a festival with so many bananas ?). Structurally non-existent, Rox soon gets clogged with too many ideas, but apart from one disastrous attempt to alienate the audience it is a good revue vehicle and gave a lot of pleasure.

Among other new plays The Occultist by Nottingham University started like a third-rate Hammer film. It actually managed to get worse. The nearest thing I have seen to a play about absolutely nothing, it raises embarrassing questions about the criteria for selection. Iaine Renwick's Split Level (Cambridge University Mummers) holds the attention at least. A motherless boy acts mother to the cripple who begat him. He is obsessed with the role of women and what he believes to be his father's guilt and the final coup echoes Ibsen's Ghosts. But the play creaks like a first-year sociology thesis. Too many shots are fired at random, as if the author were set on discussing The Main Problems of the World Today in half an hour flat.

Bingley College staged The Waiting Room and Wild about Harry, both by David Simpson. Both slight fragments about suburban despair and both over long (a general complaint), they won excellent performances from Maggie Stock and Martin Millgate as two lost souls in the desert of middle age. But much the most searing social comment, coming not from the kitchen sink but from down among the lice in the garbage can, was Bretton Hall College's Saturday. This picture of a young, degenerate couple in a world of violence and squalor produced moving performances from Chris Kavanagh and Richard Lewis. The pathetic aspirations of two human beings crushed by ignorance and deprivation was politically and socially a lot more withering than Bath College's honest attempt to unravel the problems of Northern Ireland.

Treading a narrow tightrope between illustrated lecture and theatre, The Orange, the Green and the Red, White and Blue staged Parliamentary debates within the audience and struggled with impossible conditions and cod documentary techniques. But despite some powerful imagery, it left the audience with no very much clearer view of the Irish vortex.

Among other revivals, Cambridge ADC gave a careful rendering of Bingo. But Edward Bond's stark, wintry play finally seized up completely under the strain of one-paced rhetoric. And asking an actor to play Ben Jonson in total darkness, while all the light is focused on a broad brick stove is a bit unfair. Glasgow University went a long way towards proving that Murder in the Cathedral was actable. There were some fine moments, particularly the appearance of four knights straining like mastiffs on enormous leashes. But for a play that depends so much upon the words, this production was extraordinarily difficult to hear. Cardiff University had even more intractable material in Louis MacNeice's The Dark Tower. But this dated Quest upon a Sea of Doubt had a haunting conviction and moments of enchantment. Hessian figures merged like rocks in and out of an Arabian landscape; and though styles of movement were inconsistent, one sensed an involvement which many others lacked.

To end on a totally non-suicidal note, Hold Your Horses Mussolini from the Welsh College of Drama was an innocent piece of trivia about King Zog of Albania. It needed much slicker staging but nevertheless had all the charm of a Ruritanian Thé Dansant. The Private Life of Superman was Bradford University's fine piece of comic-strip cliché. With all the commercial trappings of a generation of gum-chewers, it was a perfect antidote for the despondent.

But they do measure something

Nicholas Mackintosh looks at the assumptions underlying the main arguments in the IQ debate, and finds many of them woefully illogical

The IQ Controversy. Edited by Ned Block and Gerald Dworkin.

Intelligence testing has a bad name, and if any more of its foremost practitioners publish worthless, and possibly fraudulent data which are widely hailed as examples of painstaking, impeccable research, that reputation will be fully deserved. The demonstration that the data of Sir Cyril Burt are totally valueless, even if it cannot affect the validity of other people's data, has already been used to discredit the entire testing movement. Supporters of IQ tests will have to polish up their defence. They could start by trying to answer some of the arguments advanced by Professors Block and Dworkin, two American philosophers who, in a long concluding chapter which is by far and away the most valuable part of the present book, provide a systematic, reasoned critique of IQ tests.

Reasoned argument is something that has been singularly absent from most discussions of IQ tests. Confident assertions by their proponents that the scientific measurement of intelligence represents one of psychology's most enduring achievements, a shining example of the application of scientific method to human affairs, are countered by yet more strident criticisms: that IQ tests measure nothing more than conformity to white, middle-class values, or the opportunity and willingness to accept the training regime imposed by schools; that it is impossible or meaningless to assign a number to an intangible such as intelligence; that tests are deliberately used as instruments of political oppression. The suggestion that genetic factors are significantly implicated in variations in IQ serves only to lower an already low level of discussion, between those on the one hand who pronounce that 80 per cent of the variation in IQ in the European and American population is genetically determined (a pronouncement not to be disputed unless one has fully mastered the intricacies of modern biometrical genetics) and those on the other hand who denounce the claim as further proof of the sinister political motivations of IQ testers.

> We can be sure that IQ scores are not merely a product of chance, but reflect some relatively stable characteristics of the individual

It is a dispiriting picture, and most of The IQ Controversy makes dispiriting reading. With the exception of the editors' own contribution, it consists of a collection of already published American articles written over the past 50 years: starting with an exchange between Walter Lippmann and Louis Terman, one of the developers of the Stanford-Binet IQ test, it continues with some of the retorts to Jensen's Harvard Educational Review article, extracts from Kamin's paper seeking to demolish the evidence for the heritability of IQ, and an exchange between Herrnstein and Chomsky.

The editors are quite candid about the readings they have selected; they have not, they say, attempted to present all sides of the issue. Indeed they have not. Less easy to understand is their policy of providing only the secondary sources, a plethora of commentaries on, and discussions of the data, but never the primary data on which one might make up one's own mind. It is this that makes the book so dispiriting. Read straight through, it produces a sense of surfeit at the constant repetition of similar opinions, and a sense of despair as one comes to see how many of those opinions are mere expressions of prejudice uncontaminated by contact with the evidence.

Even where the opinions are reasonable, one is rarely given adequate reason for believing them. Thus the editors conclude that there is a significant genetic component to variations in IQ, but that the available data do not permit one to make precise estimates of the proportion of that variance attributable to genetic factors. I believe both these statements are probably true, but they might well bewilder the innocent reader whose only contact with the data has been via Kamin's analysis, which concludes that there is "no evidence sufficient to reject the hypothesis of zero heritability of IQ scores." What is he to make of this ? That it is all just a matter of opinion ?

The IQ Controversy considers three main questions. What do IQ tests measure ? Are differences in IQ between individuals and between groups in part genetically determined ? And what are the social implications of any such genetic differences ? The first of these is actually very much the hardest question to answer.

We know that IQ tests measure something, because their "reliability" is high. That is to say, your score on an IQ test today will be very similar to your score on a different test tomorrow, and is probably very similar to your score several years ago (the correlation between the scores of six to nine-year-old children and their scores as adults is about 0.70).

So we can be sure that IQ scores are not merely a product of chance, but reflect some relatively stable characteristics of the individual. But what are those characteristics ? How could we be certain that IQ tests measured intelligence unless we could show that people with high IQs were also intelligent and those with low IQ scores were stupid ? And how could we set about showing this unless we had an independent measure of intelligence ? But if we had such a measure, why should we need IQ tests ? The dilemma is familiar, as are the answers suggested. We do have rough and ready independent criteria of intelligence, such as performance at school, and IQ tests are validated to the extent to which their scores correlate with such independent measures of success. Moreover, because they are highly reliable, and in particular because they are backed by impressive mathematical and statistical techniques, we hope that IQ tests will somehow surpass our earlier, crude measures of intelligence.

There is, no doubt, something in this. If those with high IQs did consistently worse at school than those with low IQs, we should be reluctant to accept that a high IQ meant high intelligence. But success at school correlates quite highly with social class, and we do not regard a person's social class as a measure of his intelligence (even if the two happen to be correlated). The search for independent criteria leads to other, equally unhappy conclusions. Scattered throughout the articles in this book are remarks which reveal the implicit assumption that an adequate measure of intelligence should predict who will be generally successful and who will not. Lippmann believes that "the main question" is "whether children who ranked high in the Stanford-Binet tests will rank high in real life." McClelland goes further and berates current IQ tests because they predict only grades in school, not "grades in life." It is an extraordinary assumption. If we are interested in measuring intelligence, why should we seek to validate our measure against a criterion such as this ? As Chomsky refreshingly notes, "one might speculate, rather plausibly, that wealth and power tend to accrue to those who are ruthless, cunning, avaricious, self-seeking, lacking in sympathy and compassion, subservient to authority, willing to abandon principle for material gain, and so on."

As it happens, the correlation between IQ and success or income is quite low; indeed, once social class and amount of education are controlled for, the contribution of IQ to success appears to be vanishingly small. Although this hardly proves that IQ scores actually do measure intelligence, we could at least be confident that if the correlation between IQ and income were perfect, IQ scores would have to measure a whole host of other characteristics besides intelligence. It is possible that they do partially measure characteristics such as diligence, persistence, or ambition, which we should distinguish from intelligence (although Block and Dworkin, having reasonably raised this possibility, proceed as if they had proved it). It is unlikely that such characteristics contribute very much to IQ scores. So what do IQ tests measure ? And how could we decide whether they measured intelligence ?

> We may hope for the day when a spirit of cooperation produces tests which do measure differences in abilities, and when we can forget the idea that the only adequate test of intelligence will be one which predicts success in the real world

The answer, surely, will depend on our ability to develop an adequate theory of intellectual and cognitive function. If IQ testing is to be condemned, it is because it has developed completely divorced from any underlying theoretical understanding of human intelligence. It is a technology, whose methods and procedures have been determined solely by technological considerations. Items are frequently chosen for inclusion in IQ tests, not because there is a priori reason to believe they tap a particular intellectual function, but because they "work"—that is to say, because the answers to them correlate well with the answers given to other items, and because they predict, let us say, school performance. The fault of course, is not that of the technologists alone; experimental psychologists, who have studiously ignored the testing movement, are at least equally to blame.

We do, however, now have at least some understanding of intellectual performance, and progress in cognitive psychology and artificial intelligence promises to illuminate further the ways in which we think and solve problems, perceive abstract relations, and reason with abstract concepts. We may hope for the day when a spirit of cooperation produces tests which do measure differences in these and related abilities, and when we can forget the idea that the only adequate test of intelligence will be one which predicts success in the real world.

The second question, whether genetic factors contribute to differences in IQ scores, is by comparison rather easily answered. There is good reason to believe that in North American and British populations at least IQ is partly heritable. The evidence may not be overwhelming, but on any impartial reading it is persuasive. Identical twins resemble one another quite closely in IQ even when they have been brought up apart, while unrelated children brought up in the same family do not resemble each other very closely. Foster children do not resemble their foster parents as closely as ordinary children resemble their biological parents, but in one study foster children resembled their own biological parents from whom they had been separated by the age of six months. Few of the published studies are free of fault, but most efforts to dismiss this evidence reflect more on the prejudices of the writer than on the worth of the evidence.

This is not to say, however, that there exist data which should lead anyone to accept the claim so confidently advanced by Jensen, Herrnstein, Eysenck and others that 80 per cent of the variability in IQ scores is attributable to genetic factors. It is not so much that the claim exaggerates the importance of genetic factors (although it probably does); the problem is that the data are simply inadequate for quantitative analysis. To take one example: the correlation in IQ scores between identical twins reared apart cannot be used to assign a number to an estimate of heritability unless it can be shown first that there is no correlation between the environments experienced by the two twins in each pair at any stage of their life, and secondly that the range of environments experienced by the entire set of twins is reasonably representative of that found in the population as a whole. None of the acceptable studies of identical twins has satisfied either of these criteria, and none of them, therefore, provides data worth quantitative analysis. As Block and Dworkin note, every quantitative estimate of heritability "either relies on highly flawed data or depends on assumptions so arbitrary that their main justification would seem to be that without some such assumptions one could not arrive at any heritability estimate at all".

There is, moreover, a crucial ambiguity, which they bring out well, about the interpretation of a significant genetic contribution to differences in IQ. It is possible that genetic differences affect IQ, not directly through some effect on the biochemistry of the brain, but indirectly via the environment. The genotype for high IQ might be one which makes children more interesting for adults to talk to, or which inclines children to expose themselves to intellectually stimulating environments. These are intriguing possibilities, about which we are largely ignorant. Once again, however, having raised a possibility, Block and Dworkin proceed as if

Miners, Quarrymen and Saltworkers
Contributors: Raphael Samuel, Merfyn Jones, Brian Didsbury, Dave Douglass
The first book to be published in the History Workshop Series, Village Life and Labour, was given an enthusiastic reception. Stuart Weir in The Times described it as 'a magnificent draught, full of life and bite'. This second volume in the Series deals with nineteenth-century mineral workers of every class. It offers three detailed local studies: pit life in County Durham, slate quarrying in North Wales, and saltworkers in Cheshire. The contributors have an intimate knowledge of the trades they write about, and have lived and worked in the areas they describe. They are concerned with family and community setting, with social relationship at the point of production, with job control and trade unionism, and with material culture as well as with wages and earnings. Excellent early photographs illustrate the book.

Communication and Learning in Small Groups
DOUGLAS BARNES and FRANKIE TODD
Presents evidence to show that children—as pupils—possess skills and competences rarely called for in a conventional classroom set up. The authors recorded 13-year-old children talking, in small groups and without a teacher, about school learning tasks. They argue that children of average ability display in small groups a range of learning skills which could usefully complement those drawn on in conventional teacher-class discussion.

Just what we don't need

The Clever Moron. By R. S. Scorer. Routledge and Kegan Paul £3.95. 7100 8552 4.

Sir Peter Medawar launched his excruciatingly clever review of Teilhard de Chardin's The Phenomenon of Man with what he called a "bouquet of aphorisms" culled from that extraordinary book. It was an apt gambit, and one I would like to borrow as the best means of conveying the flavour of Richard Scorer's even more peculiar work. Among the observations sprinkled throughout the text of The Clever Moron are: "We thrive on evolution", "There is no housing problem—only an excess of population", "We must not suppose that data are useful", "We are bent on the mass multiplication of the illiterate and the unemployed", "The world was transformed by life", and "Life cannot be planned". To drive the wisdom home, all are printed at least twice.

According to a review of Professor Scorer's last book in The Times Higher Education Supplement: "He lashes out at industrialists, accountants, politicians, even housewives, whose complacency with material security, if not amended, will make a major catastrophe inevitable." That is more or less what he does again this time. The colourful dust jacket of The Clever Moron forewarns us that Scorer "challenges bureaucrats and mindless scientists" and "bitterly criticizes hasty technological advances which by their very success destroy the environment". In the preface and elsewhere he spells out his motivation for writing the book: while "almost every member of our affluent society is touchy to the point of neurosis" and "while the world is working hard and worrying how we are all going to be fed, some of us have come to recognize that it will soon be impossible". Indeed: "I have been able to rub my eyes a bit clearer and resist the cancer of cynicism that has consumed so many people who found that life was nice and easy for them."

What this amounts to is that Professor Scorer has written a breezy book about problems—of pollution, resource depletion, food supply, and environmental deterioration—which have been hitting the headlines for approaching a decade now. The form into which he has cast his seemingly random thoughts resembles one of those euphoric saloon bar disputations that lurch from anecdotes to statistics, from politics to freewill, from the logical to the outright nutty. And the nuttiest part of all is the very end, where Scorer urges us to take the topics listed in the index and discuss them. Typical entries are: Neasden; cake; thatch; silver iodide; Robin Hood; beryllium; goodies, another round of; moan, the common; and solution, not offered.

I have spent a considerable time trying to identify a passage that summarizes any underlying message in this novel work. It comes on p 153: "History will record that the world became dominated by a race of clever morons in the twentieth century. By maximizing their turnover they became the most inefficient civilization that ever lived. More effective in prodigality than any forebears, they bequeathed a cruel impasse to their children: no salvation without decimation. They were so clever that, intoxicated, they forgot humility and proudly made numbskulls of themselves. Every new discovery was used to postpone the reckoning, which was found ultimately to come to the mineral nomad, by heightening the debt. They congratulated themselves each time they proved the pessimists wrong."

Scorer makes some astute observations while fleshing out this thesis. Travellers, he reminds us, have found that a poor society is often a generous one—generous even to rich travellers. And he makes a good point succinctly in arguing against the habits of much modern medicine: "The awful thing in a situation of this kind, where people are looking for instant remedies, is that instant remedies usually do produce the most effective instant result."

Much of the book, however, is a rehearsal of the obvious, the flippant, and the naive. Do we really need to be told that "the transition to a less energy-consuming way of life will come about gradually as a result of the pressures due to increased fuel prices"? Or that "bureaucracy can smother personal qualities, particularly when it deals with too many people"? No. I do not believe we need to part with £3.95 to encounter thoughts of this sort, nor to peruse the eccentric flippancy in such observations as: "We even give extra grants to students who can't delay getting married, poor things, until they have graduated and are able to support their families" and "We recognize that we are in the biggest and most dangerous population explosion in the history of any species on earth. Yet at every corner we see posters urging us to save the children, save the children, save the children, save the children . . ." and "It is nonsense for a person who uses up £10,000 a year in getting through life to accuse a youth who breaks a few windows of vandalism".

Scorer's naivety on medicine and science is surprising. Keep fit classes, for example, with their "inane diet of music", are unnecessary. The first job of the leader should be "to tell the ladies they mostly need not come". They should walk more and take fewer lifts. I see what he means, because I know at least one company director who started getting up earlier to do exercises when he acquired a chauffeur to speed him from door to door. But many people do not follow the simple, boring injunctions of preventive medicine, any more than they restrict themselves scrupulously to a simple, boring diet which may reduce dental caries—another of Scorer's optimisms. Keep fit classes do, therefore, have value. Why such bitterness should be expended on them beats me.

Professor Scorer both misinterprets science and undervalues it. Science has not become "more and more a matter of interpreting and using facts". The collection of data is a stage in the development of any branch of science, but one which in time is superseded by wider, less complex pictures with increasing explanatory power. "Leadership" is not an example of the biological phenomenon of mutation. And contrary to Scorer's assurance that we must not try to be more scientific ("especially if it means the use of computers") many of the most publicized problems of the day—from pollution control to arms control—depend on sophisticated science, whatever else they require in terms of political initiatives. But then Scorer seems to despise most scientists—the "silly" imitators of Faraday and Einstein. "Actually", he goes on, "to most people they don't look silly at all, because imitators constitute the majority of people working in science and carry with them the big research budgets in industry, in the public service and in the universities". Not even the silliest of these persons, however, have claimed that fusion energy would "solve all our problems"—as Scorer implies by putting those words in quotation marks.

If this review reads as a disjointed assemblage, that is no more than a reflexion of the book itself. The Clever Moron is certainly readable and racy. As a serious work, it contains nothing that has not been said earlier, more elegantly, and with more substance by Barbara Ward, Barry Commoner, René Dubos, Paul Ehrlich, E. F. Schumacher and others. The general reader may find it bewildering—not least in fathoming Professor Scorer's passionate criticism of economic growth at a time when we in Britain are floundering amid unparalleled industrial stagnation and recession.

we knew it were true: a few pages later, we read that "environmental differences also contribute to some (perhaps most) of the genetically caused variance in IQ".

Finally, what are the social or educational implications of IQ testing, and of the demonstration of a probably significant contribution of genetic factors to differences in IQ scores? The easy, but also surely correct answer is that few if any practical implications follow from any such demonstration. As Chomsky notes, we are not massively concerned that height or hair colour, musical or athletic ability may have high heritability. Why are we so concerned about IQ? Because we believe that IQ is more important? But as we have seen it is not particularly important. Even if it were an overwhelmingly significant determinant of success, why should that make its heritability so important? There is a tendency to believe that the heritability of IQ implies, for example, that our schools should be stratified by ability. This is sheer nonsense. The educational justification for streaming or for comprehensives, as for any aspect of educational policy, is surely whether it works. As educators, our concern should be to enable our students to maximize their potential. The origins of any differences in their ability are simply irrelevant to the question of how we may act to enable them to realize that potential.

The possibility that differences between particular groups within a population, as well as differences between individuals, are partly genetic in origin does not alter the argument. Even if it were true, for example, that the difference between the IQ scores of North American blacks and whites were in any way due to genetic differences (and however high the heritability of IQ differences within either group, that provides no reason for supposing that the difference between the two groups is genetically determined), this could have no effect on our treatment of individuals unless we were operating on implicitly racist assumptions. To Jensen's claim that we should examine the possible contribution of genetic causes to "the disproportionate representation of different racial groups in various levels of the educational, occupational, and socio-economic hierarchy", the proper reply is provided by Lewontin: "Nonsense. . . What we are morally obliged to do is to eliminate blackness per se as a cause of unequal treatment and for that programme we have no need of genetics."

None of this is to deny that many people have claimed to deduce important social and educational implications from the premise that differences in IQ are heritable. There is no end to human illogicality. This only makes it more important that those who find these conclusions objectionable should turn their attention to the fallacies in the reasoning rather than appear to accept the logic of the argument by attempting, often dishonestly, to deny the truth of its premise. The premise is probably true; the conclusions do not follow.

M. D. Vernon

Inquiring Man: The Theory of Personal Constructs. By D. Bannister and Fay Fransella.
Penguin 90p. 14 08 0617 2.

It has for long been accepted that we categorize our experiences, and in the light of these categories anticipate coming events and direct our behaviour accordingly. The American psychologist, George Kelly, supposed that categorical clusters, which he termed "personal constructs", covered all our perceptions, ideas, attitudes, feelings, etc. They are organized within a system, peculiar to each person, persistent yet modifiable by new experience. Moreover, people can understand themselves and each other in so far as they achieve an understanding of their personal constructs. The elements making up any one construct, for instance relating to personality qualities, can be recorded and ranked in importance by means of what Kelly termed the "repertory grid technique". But though certain principles are presented as to the general nature of constructs, for instance their narrowness or inclusiveness, their looseness or tightness, little information is given as to what particular constructs are supposed to exist, how they are constituted and what elements they contain.

This vagueness may have been imported by the present authors, along with the irrelevant title of the book. Having summarily dismissed every other psychological theory, they advocate Kelly's with more fervour than clarity. Their argument is confused, containing many inferences and assertions for which there is little supporting evidence. A more systematic and factual exposition is needed to enable the reader to judge the validity and usefulness of the theory.

Pain is not a single unitary sensation of damage to the body, but a diverse complex of experiences, often varying with individual states of mind. These experiences, especially those of certain types of pathological pain, such as that of "phantom limb" pain appearing in a limb which has been amputated, cannot therefore be adequately explained by the older theories of direct transmission of nerve impulses to the brain from specific pain receptors in the skin, etc.

After discussing these earlier theories, the author suggests that patterns of sensory impulses from a variety of receptors are summated and modified during transmission by particular fibres of the spinal cord. Transmission is further controlled, even inhibited, by impulses from brain centres. Thus the nature, severity and persistence of pain experiences vary with general bodily states, attitudes and emotions. This theory also accounts for the fact that severe pain may be relieved by certain types of stimulation, including acupuncture, and by drug injection at suitable sites, rather than by section of nerves or the spinal cord. There is considerable evidence to support the theory, but more is needed to prove it.

This book provides a most interesting and extensive discussion of the puzzling phenomena of pain. But although it is well argued and clearly written, it is sometimes difficult to follow because of the complexity of the problem. Thus it is less suitable for general readers than for those with some knowledge of neurophysiology.

Clear thinking

Aspects of Political Theory. By W. J. Stankiewicz.
Collier-Macmillan £4.95. 02 977630 9.
Thinking Politically. By Jean Blondel.
Wildwood House £5.95. 7045 01473. £3.25. 0229 1.

Professor Stankiewicz takes as his central theme the classical idea of sovereignty and uses it in consideration of such notions as the social contract, general will, natural law, public interest and so on. His object is to relate the philosophical ideas to the more practical concepts of political science. The volume comes between his "In defense of sovereignty" and a volume yet to come. The perspective is historical as well as philosophical but the essay is no mere restatement of earlier ideas: it is an attempt at a revival of theory as a mode of thought. And so the author links the old philosophy to our society. Students of law and politics, and, dare one say, of sociology, ought to look behind the facts of their disciplines: the intellectual effort demanded by this book will undoubtedly help to clarify minds.

Professor Blondel's book attempts to bring together three strands of political theory: the behavioural, structural and normative: this should help to improve the image of political studies. His general discussion covers legalism, prescription, normative theory, the nature of politics and methodology, supplemented by essays on his three main topics. These books complement each other admirably; for readers of this journal their prime significance is that they will get people thinking and to that end they are commended especially to more advanced students whose studies might otherwise be too strictly utilitarian and hence less useful than they are intended to be.

Private and public lives

Geoffrey Parkinson

Ideology and Social Welfare. By Vic George and Paul Wilding.
Routledge and Kegan Paul £4.25. 7100 8273 8. £2.20. 8290 8.

The early chapters in this book are impressive. We are offered brief but brilliant sketches of contemporary political and economic theorizations. Enoch Powell, F. A. Hayek (author of The Road to Serfdom) and the lesser known M. Friedman are usefully bunched together as protagonists of "anti-collectivism"; apt quotations and summarizations present their overwhelming preoccupation with the question of human freedom and their fears about greedy "colonization" by a forceful, but inefficient state machinery ("Lift the curtain and 'the State' reveals itself as a little group of fallible men in Whitehall, making guesses about the future" declares Powell).

Next comes the classification of a more diffuse group of thinkers who can in a general way be labelled "reluctant collectivists". These include outstanding figures in the liberal tradition like Keynes, Beveridge and Galbraith, all of whom, by their pragmatism, came to recognize that the classical assumption of Capitalism to produce a self-regulating economy had failed and that the limited state intervention is, therefore, necessary. "The world is not so governed from above that private and social interest always coincide" observes Keynes, perhaps succinctly summarizing the position of them all.

Descriptions of the better known viewpoints of the Fabians ("Capitalism can be transformed peacefully into socialism") and the Marxists conclude the study of contemporary theorizing and we then turn with some hope to that final chapter for a mountain top—or at least a hilltop-glimpse of the scene that may make a little sense of the conflicting ideologies.

What we get, in fact, is an ill-prepared radical tract that advocates regimented welfare to deal with unresolved social problems. There appears to be no link with the controversial discussions in the earlier part of the book; the dilemmas posed by the various advocates of classical capitalism and welfare capitalism are not answered but merely ignored. The reader—or at least this reader—is left with that feeling of evangelical ruthlessness and desperation that so often lingers around second-rate radical speculation.

"Modern man has burned his hands in the fire which he himself kindled". Not an ancient aphorism but the starting point of Seyyed Hossein Nasr's latest book, Islam and the Plight of Modern Man (Longman £7.75. 582 78053 5), a thoughtful study of Eastern and Western traditions, ideologies and spiritual trends.

Longman Imprint Books.

Imprints are so firmly a part of most English teachers' classroom arsenal that there can be little fresh to say about the series. The 1977 crop offers permutations of the familiar format: editorial introduction, the text, photographs, questions for discussion, and further reading items.

Saturday Night and Sunday Morning, Sillitoe's homage to his youth, sports an introduction from the ageing angry young man himself, now an exile in Majorca. "The greatest inaccuracy was ever to call the book a 'working-class novel' for it is really nothing of the sort". The anger is still at work, somewhat ironically for the Imprint series who have since championed the rough, tough "working-class" writings of Sid Chaplin, Stan Barstow, Keith Waterhouse and others besides. David Craig's lucid and lively commentary at the end provides teachers with plenty of scope for extended discussion, and photographs of Nottingham with notes on the Midland dialect complete a fine school edition.

The L-Shaped Room, 15 years on, receives a similar retrospective from its author: "It was a best seller. Why was it? Why this book and not others, better written, more profound, or what-have-you?" The answer then, as today, is that it is a splendid adolescent read, and remarkably undated. The photographs of Fulham taken for this edition reflect a largely unchanged bed-sitter land; extracts from the two sequels The Backward Shadow and Two Is Lonely are included alongside sensible commentary.

Examination perennial Cider With Rosie has seen many editions and the latest Imprint is the best yet. Laurie Lee has added an anthology of 10 poems under the theme "Life in the Country", editor Chris Buckton has come up with extensive suggestions for further study, there is an essay from the author with previously unpublished family snapshots, and an enchanting pictorial sequence of life in Laurie Lee's native village of Slad in the Cotswolds.

With African, Western, Carribean selections already available in the series, it is no surprise to come across Eight American Stories. Editorial contribution is substantial and rewarding for class use but the choice of tales is less happy. Sherwood Anderson's "I Want to Know Why" and John Updike's "Pigeon Feathers" are difficult stories, Stephen Minot's "Sausage and Beer" is disappointing, and in Richard Wright's strident "Big Boy Leaves Home" the Southern nigga' dialect presents comprehension problems for the average CSE student. As a prose picture of America this collection is sadly lop-sided.

The Pressures of Life has four plays written for television which explore that theme. Barry Hines's "Speech Day" with its witty treatment of school-life, will be the pupils' pick of a consistently good bunch. There are obvious pitfalls in adapting from television to classroom study, but the editing rarely falters, and an informative essay on television drama neatly rounds off. Softly, Softly by the prolific Elwyn Jones contains five scripts from the BBC series, with old favourites Barlow and Watt (Stratford Johns and Frank Windsor) in unwavering form.

Commercial choice

Modern Commerce. An Introductory Course. By A. G. Hall.
Heinemann Educational £1.60. 0 435 45673 3.
First Steps in Commerce. By Mary Moyle and Marion Gow.
Pitman £1.30. 0 273 00728 9.

These two books, which have been published within a few months of one another, are remarkably similar in their titles, scope, content, style and size; for, although the format of Mr Hall's book (which includes unspecified additional material by K. M. Hall) is larger than that of its rival, and it has many more illustrations, some of them cartoons, the texts are of about equal length.

Each of the books has more than 20 short chapters and is aimed specifically at the requirements of the CSE commerce paper. The chapter headings in several instances are almost identical and, quite remarkably, the details of the texts sometimes correspond. For example, they both refer to the limit of 20 partners imposed by the Partnership Act 1890, without a mention of the relaxation, which speedily proved popular, granted by the Companies Act 1967, and each cites Billingsgate and Smithfield as examples of London's markets, but neither mentions Leadenhall.

All in all, both books may be said to have achieved their main objective: to initiate the reader into his first studies of commerce and to whet his appetite for the heavier works that it will often be his lot to study later in depth.

It is a commonplace that in a first textbook it is difficult to condense a topic so as to give an adequate summary without imparting misleading information. Mr Hall refers to this dilemma, but I found a large number of errors, some of them serious, in his chapter 7.

Both books have their strong points: Modern Commerce has its illustrations and First Steps its compact text and dimensions which fairly qualify it for the description "pocket size".

Mr Noselighter. By Roger McGough. Illustrated by André François.

Hagar the Horrible. By Dik Browne.
Egmont/Methuen 75p. 0416 05210 X.

Here's a tip: when you promise a leprechaun some milk and a biscuit, don't forget. Mr Noselighter did and look what happened to him. Mr Noselighter looks like one of the scruffiest publications of the year. Not only are the charcoal pictures smudged with a rough kind of pastel crayon, the text is also full of smutty jokes about dirty nappies and smelly toes.

Mr Noselighter has a candle instead of a nose, which any child will tell you is ridiculous. And he runs around muttering childish rhymes and most of the text is in idiotic limericks. The more serious minded will be pleased to learn that Mr Noselighter is turned into an elephant. This is to remind him to be less forgetful next time, but children will just be delighted with the endless stupidity of the man without a nose.

More sensitive souls on the other hand will find curious undertones in Little Blue and Little Yellow. The antics of blobs and dots and lines has already made fantasy cartoons out of mathematics. Little Blue is water colour fantasy. When Little Blue Blob meets Little Yellow Blob, the Permissive Society permits them to hug—and not only hug but to merge into each other "until they are green"—well who wouldn't be? Then, as if this wasn't enough, the bright green blob sets off on all sorts of Freudian adventures, along dark tunnels and up high mountains. And in the end all the blobs hug one another. The fathers hug each other and so do the mothers—and naturally they all turn green as well. Then everyone else plays hugging, with surprising results. It's amazing what you can put into a simple story about mixing paints.

Finally, without any morals at all, Hägar the Horrible makes his début. Hägar is a beastly barbarian—the Danish answer to "Asterix the Gaul", though without that semi-intellectual brand of Roman jokes and Latin names. The cartoons are full of knockabout characters—the terrifying wife, the unmarried daughter and a son who would rather be a dentist than a Dane. Hägar chants schoolboy rhymes as he sticks his tongue out at the Vandal hordes. Things are always going wrong; the farce is crude and obvious, full of old slapstick and timeless jokes. This one will sell all right.

The British Isles: Objective Tests in Geography for O level and CSE. By K. Briggs.

Multiple Choice and Structured Questions in Geography Books I and II. The British Isles and Western Europe. By W. E. Marsden.

Objective Tests in Geography. By J. A. Lane.
Edward Arnold £1.30. 0 7131 0060 5.

These books are a response to the increasing use by examination boards of the objective tests which, as Mr Briggs argues in his introduction, "make possible such precision in examining" as the assessment of factual recall, comprehension, application of principles and concepts as well as other facets of a candidate's ability. He criticizes the inadequacy of conventional methods and there is no doubt at all that, however unpalatable this may be, there is a great deal of truth in it. Teachers will need to turn more and more to objective tests even if they seem, at first, complex and inhuman.

Each author explains the types of objective tests being used which largely fall into one of four types: multiple-choice, matching questions, multiple-completion and assertion-reason questions. Sometimes they use different names thus illustrating how easily a jargon is evolved. All books are aimed at CSE/O level and they cover the syllabus between them. J. A. Lane's book does it all; K. Briggs covers the British Isles in this volume and W. E. Marsden looks at the British Isles, Western Europe and World problems. All tests, except those of K. Briggs, have been pre-tested in schools. A great deal is made of this in W. E. Marsden's books to the extent of giving items which failed their pre-testing. Though of academic use this does seem to add further complications to an already complicated book. In all books there is a problem in presenting the tests in an understandable form, since so many marginal numbers have to be used to label each test. Mr Lane's book seems to have the simplest layout, but the answers are not provided as they are in the other books.

Mr Marsden's books are outstanding for the additional richness of source materials provided which is lacking in the other books. Indeed they could be used profitably for the excellent photographs and map extracts alone. There is also wider scope in terms of content and some parts show ingenuity and imagination. For example, a joke-map in Book 1 has placenames chosen to include some of the famous names of new geography.

All books are valuable in different ways and the teacher now needs to begin to think about using the technique of the objective test. He will need to think, however, how far he will have to adapt and change his teaching to fit in with this new kind of testing.

Constructive Mathematics. By M. Hayman.
Bell £1.35. 0 7135 1981 9 Teachers' Book, £1.80. 0 7135 1982 7.

There has been recent criticism in plenty of the quality of mathematics teaching. Cynics might claim some significance in the advent of three textbooks each reinforced by an aid for teachers. The question must arise: if teachers are so much in need of a helping hand, are they likely to benefit by the material provided here? To be frank, there is little in either of the first two books that will smooth the path of the less competent; while abler teachers could formulate more stimulating lessons for themselves.

The texts are stereotyped. The first covers standard topics of a CSE course, in more or less discrete units so that the order of the sections is generally not significant. The teacher's book, however, is little more than a complete reproduction of the pupil's book bound in with a section of answers and a few comments.

The second little book contains 32 pages of simple material related to cars. The 12-page guide does offer points for discussion and the whole may save a teacher some time in the preparation of his lessons. It is not, however, very exciting.

But now the good news. Outstanding in a lengthy shelf of texts intended for the less academic pupil is Constructive Mathematics. Mrs Hayman is an articulate teacher, of wide experience and the highest quality. Active in the Mathematical Association (of which she is a past president) and the Institute of Mathematics and its Applications, and other bodies, she thinks deeply about her subject.

This book derives from a course for non-examination pupils in the fifth form of a comprehensive school "which developed from the interests of the pupils". Thus the right note is struck from the start. The noblest aspirations of teachers mean nothing if the pupils' attention is not gained, and held.

There is convincing demonstration in these pages that concepts of critical path analysis, flow diagrams, probability and symmetry are all within the grasp of most children when appropriately presented. At the same time, such fundamentals as prime numbers, graphical representation of the relationships between variables, and the use of maps, can be taught pari passu. All these topics are, in fact, included, and the teachers' book really does illuminate the theory and practice of the work. How to choose a theme, how to take advantage of a classroom situation, how to gather material, initiate discussions, involve the class and transmit the satisfaction to be gained from mastery of a subject—these matters are all explicit or implicit in a first-class work.

Mrs Hayman suggests that the course could occupy one year of non-examination work, but may be equally effective for CSE pupils (it has been the basis of a validated Mode 3 syllabus) or for a common 16-plus examination or CEE programme. Indeed, the work can be strongly recommended for all these purposes. There is no doubt that in such fields it is the year's "best buy".

Acting on ideas

Roy Blatchford

Ideas In Action 3. By Peter Thomson and Clive Goodhead. 95p. 340 17725 X.
Onward to the Oregon. By Patricia Yates. 55p. 340 16955 9. Hodder and Stoughton.

In similar vein but more flamboyant than its predecessors, the third Ideas In Action bristles with "intentions" for drama. The authors see the book very much in pupils' hands, the teacher an advising interloper. This is drama as improvisation not as theatre, and the handbook approach lends itself to successful application in small groups of drama addicts, perhaps those engaged in a Mode 3 CSE course.

Suggestions for a game of human draughts, acting out a collection of patterns, interpreting dreams and nightmares, or recreating the days of the Forty-niner are delivered in a direct and chatty style ("drama means doing . . . acting as a class, in groups, or even just talking to your neighbour") which may send some English teachers scurrying away.

Each chapter divides into stimulus (a passage to read or a picture), discussion and preparation, improvisation, performance, critical appraisal of completed work, and follow-up, with the introductory pre-project on the "I want" situation offered as the secret to what will ensue. If Thomson and Goodhead are right, emphasis on motive in improvisation will avoid what Stanislavsky called the sense of "unreasonable presence", that is, the performer without direction.

The method is a simple way for inexperienced actors to appreciate dramatic intention. Thus the following is "a lot like the situation in Hamlet" . . .

Prince: You did.
King: I didn't.
Queen: Have a chocolate.

The enigma exploded. Ideas In Action is a mind-boggling source book for the drama specialist.

Developing out of project work in Book 2, its co-author, Patricia Yates, has recently published Onward to Oregon. Suitable for lower secondary actors, it offers a basic script with scope for lively and colourful improvisation.

Visualizing history

Rosemary O'Day

Marriage. By Jennifer Harris and Alistair Wisker. £2.95. Immigrants. By Philippa Stewart. £3.25. Doctors. By R. D. Lobban. £2.85. Prisons. By Rosamund Morris. £2.95. Engineers and Engineering. By Hugh Thompson. £2.95. Past-into-Present series.

The Middle Ages. Tudor England. The Stuart Age. By Peter Lane. Visual Sources series. £2.95 each. Batsford.

The idea behind the Past-into-Present Series, already well established with many titles to its credit, is one which is eminently acceptable to me. The authors all accept that the past is part of the present—that mankind is unique because it not only acknowledges the existence of the past and treasures its memory but because it explores this past for clues to the present. The five titles represented here all deal with topics of current and immediate interest to the young and attempt to show in an entertaining but informative manner how institutions, professions and social phenomena developed in response to a changing society.

I do not think that they are all equally successful. Perhaps it is significant that the book dealing with the subject about which I know most—Marriage—left me with the greatest feeling of being let down. The evolution of the institution of marriage throughout the centuries is a naturally fascinating subject—with all its implications for the study of the family, of the role of women in society, of education, of population and so on. The authors hint at these implications, and indeed devote several pages to the issue of challenges to marriage as an institution, but I feel that they give the reasonably able teenager rather less than he/she deserves. The text is very choppy and often seems undigested.

The authors concentrate far too much upon evidence of noble and royal marriages (without, for example, even pointing out that royal marriages have always made a tremendous practical impression upon marriages further down the social scale); they ignore much available printed evidence of marriage customs in the pre-industrial era among the lower and middle classes; they often fail to make the most interesting points recently emerging from historical research about marriage patterns. In the latter context, although the authors set Peter Laslett's book as further reading, they fail to make his point about late age at marriage among the lower as opposed to the aristocratic classes as pertaining to the years before 1700, to draw attention to the relationship of age at marriage to age of puberty and hence to diet. Thus my main complaint is that this book simply describes marriage customs and attempts to relate these customs to their social base in a rather patchy way instead of giving the story a much needed continuity by relating marriage to its economic base throughout. It is another case of under-estimating the ability of teenagers to grasp basic concepts; it's also the reason why so many students soon see history as irrelevant.

Hugh Thompson's Engineers and Engineering seems to succeed, however, and this would be a useful book for the careers shelf. Immigrants and Prisons are both books which provide an excellent basis for social studies sessions. Doctors is also a thorough account of the growth of the medical profession in the context of a changing society. I find its attitude to the medical beliefs of pre-industrial society somewhat unsympathetic, but if it is complemented by other reading on pre-industrial society this should not prove irremediable.

The three Visual Source Books are just that. Or I should add, just that unless the enterprising teacher ensures that the books are used as more than mines of "information" for stereotyped projects. The dust jacket boasts "this series shows how visual sources can be used as evidence by the young historian when studying the history of Britain" but the book does not live up to this boast. The author does not seem to use his illustrations as evidence at all but as wallpaper; Josephine Tey did a much better job in Daughter of Time. He could have seized the opportunity to look at a piece of visual evidence and asked the student (with considerable guidance) to deduce certain points about medieval or early modern life from it—in other words to have shown how the historian uses visual evidence as a supplement to or substitute for the written evidence—instead he asks the school child to draw a medieval street scene. Whereas one would not wish to dispute that the study of history should be a pleasurable experience, it is surely true that whereas drawing street scenes adds nothing to the schoolchild's historical sense, an enjoyable detective game certainly does and has much more to do with history.

No guessing

New Objective Tests in History, 1760-1848: British and European. By E. G. Rayner, R. F. Stapley and J. B. Watson.

Hodder and Stoughton £1.50. 0 340 19423 5.

Whatever our prejudices about the value of multiple choice testing in history, it is obviously here to stay, and we must come to terms with it. Somewhat glorified by the name of "objective tests", here are nearly 500 multiple choice items for practice, designed for use in preparation for fifth year examinations. The period chosen, a popular one in both CSE and O level, is subdivided into topics, so that each section could also be used, as the authors suggest, as a general revision test.

This could prove a useful book to both teacher and pupil. Examples of every kind of item used by the public examiners are given: arrangements in chronological order, distinctions between opinion and fact, and questions based on a variety of stimulus material from maps and cartoons to the spurious conversations so favoured by examiners between the ubiquitous and self-righteous Speaker I and Speaker II. Since success in multiple choice papers is to some extent dependent on familiarity with procedures, the faithfulness of these examples to type is a point in the book's favour, as is the valuable advice given in the introduction on techniques of elimination and "informed guessing". The knowledge required to cope with many of the items is perhaps more detailed than we usually expect from CSE students, but the attempt to tame the terrors of multiple choice will be appreciated.

Office tasks

Practical Office Exercises. By John Harrison.

Pitman (third edition) £1.50 0273 000861.

Since this book was first published in 1966, it has proved to be an invaluable aid to teachers of Office Practice and Typewriting. The exercises are clearly set out, the instructions are easy to follow, and answers are given to many of the questions so that students are left in little doubt as to what is required of them.

It is particularly suitable for students preparing for the RSA Stage I and II Office Practice and the CSE examinations where the emphasis is on the practical aspect of clerical duties.

The exercises cover a wide range of clerical tasks in various types of offices, with a good selection of specimen forms, official documents, record cards, and graphs. This third edition has been enlarged to include more practical questions set in recent public examinations; and new sections dealing with requisitions, goods received notes, consignment notes, and bank statements have been added.

The secretarial section provides realistic material for students to practise composition of messages, telegrams, letters, memos, reports, agenda and minutes of meetings which can also be used for typewriting lessons.

On the whole, this is a useful guide to teachers when planning office practice assignments which are both relevant and interesting.

French-tense times

French for C.S.E. By P. C. Whitmore.
Bell £1.65. 0 7135 1989 4.

The foreword to Mr Whitmore's fifth year CSE French course tronchantly criticizes GCE examinations, pointing out that "distressingly little has all too often been done in our schools." This is with particular reference to oral work and to the fading interest and enthusiasm of pupils as increasing emphasis is placed on grammar. The author hailed the advent of CSE French as the answer to this regrettable situation. Ironically, the appearance of this second edition coincides with sweeping condemnation by a team of inspectors of the standard of modern languages teaching in comprehensive schools, in which CSE examinations are primarily taken. The pattern of the new teaching methods proclaimed by Mr Whitmore has failed lamentably in its execution, according to the inspectors' report. The abler pupils are below standard in listening, speaking, reading and writing and the less able abandon French at the first opportunity. Though Mr Whitmore's New Jerusalem has not materialized, quite the contrary would have occurred if the admirable precepts laid down in his book had been pursued by competent teachers with a receptive clientèle.

The comprehensive introduction addressed to the teacher is full of wisdom and could be read with profit by both GCE and CSE teachers. The guide-lines are unexceptionable, though I would quibble, on the grounds of ambiguity, with the example chosen for tense transposition. The classic principles of understanding and expansion, with oral guidance from the teacher, are well expressed. The Oral section itself is most skilfully planned and includes an exemplary summary of the much neglected fundamentals of stress and intonation. No teacher using this book could complain of lack of material for free composition, dictation, comprehension and grammatical and multiple-choice questions. Mr Whitmore's course is packed with relevant examples, supported by a lucid summary of the essential grammar.

First Steps in Business Training. By John Harrison.
Pitman £1.10. 0 273 00897 8.

The girl (Mr Harrison assumes that office juniors are usually female) who takes this little manual to heart is going to be the ideal clerical assistant—informed, efficient and discreet too. Among the clear and comprehensive instructions are placed a few ethical guides, of a sort which are all too rare nowadays.

Basically it is a CSE/RSA level text covering office routines and reminding the reader of economies (with the telephone for instance) that so often get overlooked.

Lit-up

With a cover photograph of the brilliantly lit stage at the Bluecoat School at Horsham (a photograph that will cause spasms of jealousy in many a professional lighting man as well as in school play producers), back into print comes The Art of Stage Lighting by Frederick Bentham (Pitman £7.50. 273 00210 4.)

This second edition is suitably updated to review the technical developments of the last 10 years and the lighting systems of our newest theatres. A sumptuous book, it is really for the enthusiast and specialist student. Both the CSE drama student and whoever has just been press-ganged into lighting the school hall will find the same publisher's Stage Lighting Handbook (by Francis Reid) to be more concise, practical and relevant.

Graham Wade reviews classroom projects in London's dockland

The militant dockworker addresses his fellows: "The union will help you, the bosses will cheat you. Look at the conditions you live in—outside lavs. Look at your families—not enough food to go round. The bosses' children have so much dinner they throw half of it away. Most of your children die before the age of three."

These powerful lines launch a play about the great London dock strike of 1889 and were written by 14-year-old Stephen Shakes, a third year pupil at Langdon Park School, Limehouse, in the middle of the capital's dockland.

This piece of work, which is one contribution to a group play, is by no means an isolated example of activity brimming over with feeling and energy at the school. It is a typical product of new courses developed there since 1973, when a few teachers decided that the traditional approach to subjects like History and English was of small relevance to their multi-racial working-class children. Instead, they began devising radically different structures around intensive studies of the locality and its history. From short-term projects these have grown into a two-year teaching programme which relies heavily on resource-based learning methods.

Irene Payne is one of the English teachers working the scheme. She explained the direction it was now taking: "We are placing greater emphasis on starting out from where the kids actually are, using family histories and memories to help us". The original courses had tended to work from nineteenth century dock history towards the present day, but now, with the active participation of parents, the starting point is contemporary community identities and culture. From here the focus extends back in time.

A key aspect is the student's immersion in personal research and documentation, allowing the individual to work through problems on his or her own. The organization of the course means that each child is part of a small group at least once a week, giving them the opportunity to make outside visits. Material gathered in these sessions is then fed back into the main class for the benefit of everyone.

During my visit I met three West Indian boys, Terry Parris, Billy Kandekore and Timothy John, who had just been working on their small group project with their teacher, Mr Bob Brett, an ex-pupil of the school. They had taken several photographs of the area, choosing the subjects to build up an image which represented their own view of the place they lived in. One of Terry's pictures showed eight tower blocks of flats all built within 50 yards of each other with only one minute playground provided for the hundreds of children who lived there. "No wonder you get vandals and all that, because the kids have got nothing to do and nowhere to go", was how Terry felt about it.

Billy had a photograph of a derelict school waiting to be demolished: "It's the old Cyril Jackson. One day something will be done about it, I hope, for the sakes of your life and the next generation." Timothy's work displayed the vast open waste spaces of the docks and some huge decaying factories.

Four girls were preparing some interviews to be tape-recorded with dockworkers the following week. How many boats berthed there now? Were there any spare jobs? When was the last strike? How much do you earn? They also wanted to visit the labour exchange to compare dockers' wages with other occupations available in the area. One girl's father was about to be made redundant as a boiler-maker with little chance of finding another job. She wanted to know why.

Someone else's mother worked in a garment factory as a presser where she was paid 9p for each dress she pressed. The group wanted to investigate the economics of dressmaking and asked the factory owner for permission to visit the works to talk to some of the women and perhaps take some photographs, but this was met with a point-blank refusal. However, they still intended to go ahead and try to find out the costs of each stage of production from uncut material through to the sale of the dress to the wholesaler, and from here discover the relationship between the workers' wages and the owner's profits. As one girl said: "We may be stopped from getting inside, but he cannot stop us from photographing the dingy dump from the outside."

During one visit inside the dock gates a small group had stumbled upon some old offices, long abandoned, full of ledgers and files. These had been rescued from oblivion and proved an invaluable resource, covering many aspects of dock work from tonnages as far back as 1948 to irregularities in cargo handling. By using audio-recorders, still cameras, occasionally a video portapack, but more especially by keeping their eyes and ears open, the students and teachers have created some remarkable material.

In the project's first year a substantial tape-slide show was produced, presenting a history of east London from 1860 until 1940 under the banner title "The People Marching On". The 30-odd slides were of various pictures, engravings and photographs culled from countless textbooks and the tape was of the students, individually and collectively, speaking and singing their own poems, songs, dramas and tales written about the themes and events which had dominated the working class life of dockland.

In 1885, the road next to the school, Dod Street, saw a series of meetings to establish the right of free speech in the area. As Ted John's poem interprets it: "Every Sunday we meet up. Every Sunday coppers break us up. Thousands and hundreds coming now—the coppers go away with a frown." Eventually, with the help of William Morris, the right was won.

A kaleidoscope of happenings from the matchgirls' strike, through the founding of the Gasworkers' Union, the 1911 Schools' Strike, the Suffragettes, the imprisonment of Poplar Council in 1921, the the General Strike, the fascist riots of the 1930s, right up to the Blitz is covered. But it is matters directly relating to the docks that are most deeply felt, and among those the unambiguous hatred reserved for the casual labour system of the docks, whereby dockers had to stand in line to be picked out for work, comes over loud and clear. "I struggled and fought my hardest to get to the front and get picked out. Hundreds of men rushed into the cage to be chosen like cattle."

In this original effort the slides had been photographed by the media resources officer and the teachers had been largely responsible for selecting the images, points they were now critical of. Since then the student's creative role has grown considerably. What is happening at Langdon Park is the result of highly committed teaching, a central element of which is the exploration of the children's own culture so frequently devalued in the wider world.

By taking a serious look at this culture, it and the students themselves grow in stature and confidence. Later in the course a large slice of time is spent on investigating foreign cultures represented in the school, but as Irene Payne says, this is undertaken by whole classes. "Areas like black and women's studies should be part and parcel of exploring your own identity and the forces that are shaping that." Black studies just for blacks were divisive and similarly with women's studies.

Langdon Park is an example of a school that is facing up to the realities of its environment and history and in doing so uses still photography and audio-visual resources to good advantage. The last word goes to Irene Payne: "I think it is important to understand that so often this type of social studies teaching merely presents a picture of the way things are, full stop. We're trying to show there are possibilities of change as well."

Close-up of class boredom

by Graham Wade

Classrooms: A photographic exhibition by Janine Wiedel
until May 5, open daily 11am-6pm.

The pictures on display in Classrooms were taken in a wide range of schools and places of learning, from free schools to public schools. The declared aim of the photographer was to present the inter-relationships between individuals, rather than make political statements about the merits of one type of institution over another. The focus is intended to be on people as opposed to systems.

For all that, the overwhelming impression left by the show is that schools are somewhat depressing places to spend time in. The picture chosen to feature on the publicity poster for the exhibition, and the one that greets you just inside the gallery door, is representative of this view, concentrating as it does on the bored detachment of some pupils.

In the foreground, sitting side by side at a pair of desks, are two teenage boys, one white, the other black, who are seen in medium close-up with their out-of-focus classmates scattered behind them. On the left the white boy is painstakingly and delicately cleaning his fingernails, while on the right the black boy is sitting with folded arms, his head tilted towards the floor, which is receiving his fixed stare as if he were miles away. Presumably to the side of the photographer there is a teacher teaching.

In a brief series of pictures the gestures of authority on the part of three teachers are momentarily captured as they point their fingers in a mixture of threat and command at recalcitrant students. The words "who rules . . ." stand out from the blackboard behind one of them. In another the concerned face of an Asian teacher is provided with an integral chalked caption which reads "the human life cycle".

All of these pictures were taken in state comprehensives and present bleak images, which are suddenly relieved by some from the Yehudi Menuhin school for specially talented children, who board there to develop their musical studies.

The impersonal concrete interiors of the comprehensives give way to thickly carpeted sitting-rooms with velvet curtains. The small girl smiling with her violin tells a different story; she not only looks happier but also manifestly healthier, and comparing her situation to that of the pupil in the inner-city state school one does not have to search far to fathom out why.

TALKBACK

John Sharwood Smith

Classics has been mighty and is now fallen. But Latin and Greek are not perished, and still attract learners; and classical studies is young and thrives.

What is classical studies? It is an area of study—potentially all we know about Mediterranean civilization between 2,000BC and AD 500, with the addition of Roman Britain: actually what any school selects, with the interests and capabilities of its pupils and teachers in mind, from a common stock of myth, legend, history, philosophy, social and political institutions, religion, art, architecture and technology.

No one has yet propounded a taxonomy of objectives, but it is thought sensible to proceed from the particular to the general: to begin with arms and armour, temples and altars, stories from myth and legend, facts about social relations; and afterwards build on this by studying the more abstract subject-matter such as the political thought and practice of the Greeks and Romans, the aesthetics of the Parthenon, ancient historiography, or Stoicism as a way of life.

Why teach the arms and armour, the myths and legends, the temples and altars of the Greeks and Romans? Why not Norman knights and monasteries, Teutonic myths and legends, and Renaissance architecture? Renaissance architecture, Teutonic myths and medieval feudalism are fascinating and important items in the cultural, political, military and technological development of Western Europe, and to be educated one should be acquainted with them. But in constructing a curriculum that attempts more than a passing encounter with unrelated items of knowledge there are advantages in the coherence, as subjects of study, of fifth century Athens or Rome in the first century BC and AD.

Remoteness is not just a matter of time or space. By comparison with a knight of the Temple or a Benedictine abbess, the people of Sophocles, Herodotus or Aristophanes seem almost contemporary with ourselves (yet are significantly different).

The claims of classical studies to a place in the curriculum are of two sorts. First, it can equally well achieve educational objectives that are claimed for other arts subjects, such as communication skills, social skills learnt through the group activities to which classical studies lends itself, the development of intellectual curiosity, the ability to select and handle evidence, awareness of historical time-span, and, perhaps most important, the growth of personality through imaginative stimulus and creative activity.

Second, there are objectives specific to classical studies, such as enhancing pupils' understanding of their environment, on the one hand by teaching something of the sources of our cultural traditions, on the other by presenting a society or societies which were different but not so different as to be incomprehensible.

Every society has its own assumptions and prejudices. An encounter with the civilizations of the Greeks and Romans can teach pupils to look more critically at their own. The claim to pre-eminence for classical studies in achieving these latter objectives rests on the quality of the subject-matter and the close interrelation, in key periods, between the aspects of society that can be studied.

Even for the early secondary years the wealth of suitable material is impressive. The story of Troy and of Odysseus can evoke imaginative work from any child who can read or listen; and the primary source material—the archaeological finds, the vase paintings, the coins and the inscriptions—provide a direct link with the classical world, and have intrinsic charm and interest. These can be a stimulus for creative work, and at the same time the building blocks of which the pupils' model of the classical world is gradually constructed.

Classical antiquity is a country of the mind, founded on a reality which is in part, but only in part, recoverable . . . a country in which we can travel happily for the rest of our lives with no danger of ever arriving. Classical studies is an introduction to that country.

John Sharwood Smith is head of the classics department, University of London Institute of Education, and author of "On Teaching Classics", to be published on Monday by Routledge and Kegan Paul (£3.25).

Liaison with primaries

Celia Allen

Our six-form entry comprehensive takes children from a large number of contributory primaries (19 last year). To ease transfer, we have developed a programme of primary-secondary liaison, so that children, parents and teachers have a clearer idea of each other's problems.

In November we hold an open evening for prospective parents, having previously circulated the primary schools with details. Parents can inspect buildings and equipment, chat to teachers, pupils and parents of children already at the school, sit in on lessons, see displays of work and watch gymnastics, dance and drama performances.

In January we show groups of parents around while the school is operating normally. These are usually parents who are uncertain about which school to choose, and inspect as many as possible.

In March we invite the heads of our contributory primaries to a lunch, where they meet the pastoral staff and follow up the progress made by the pupils which they sent to us in the previous year. Copies of each child's school reports are available. Some Heads retain these for a few days so that the class teachers have a chance to inspect them as well.

We receive the lists of our new intake in June. Letters are sent to all the parents, enclosing information about the school. A letter is sent to each child by his head of house, giving details of the house and generally helping the child to feel that he belongs. Arrangements are then made for the head of lower school and the head of the remedial department to visit the feeder primaries during June and in the first week of July.

These visits usually follow a pattern. First the head gives any relevant information about each child, and indicates which children work well together and which ought to be placed in separate groups. Advice is also given on the relative ability of each child, so that we are aware of remedial problems early and can create true mixed-ability groups.

Then the head of lower school meets the children, tells them about their new school and answers questions. Questions are also answered by several of our present first years who accompany him. We have found that they are able to allay fears more easily than an adult. Wherever possible these children are those who previously attended the primary school.

Questions asked by the prospective pupils usually fall into nine groups: new subjects, uniform, sport, school meals, discipline, how to find their way around a large building, how to cope with a large number of new teachers, bus routes, and bullying.

In the second week of July we invite all the new parents and children into school for an evening, where they can meet the senior and pastoral staff, parents of present pupils, and the uniform supplier. They then tour the building and ask as many questions as they wish.

After this, we invite the children into school, in groups of about 40, accompanied by their teachers. They see a short performance of some kind, then have a couple of "sample" lessons, preferably in "new" subjects. In this way they not only become more familiar with the building but also have a chance to meet other children from different schools. This is particularly important where we receive only one pupil from a primary school.

During July more groups of parents ask for guided tours of the school, particularly when their child has been allocated to our school although it had not been on their original list of choices.

Other visits are made during the year. The head and head of lower school accept between them all invitations to functions such as prize-givings, concerts, plays and exhibitions of work that the primary schools care to send and we invite primary staff to our functions. Members of many departments also visit the primaries to see the work done in their subjects; guidelines and syllabuses are exchanged.

Although our system is by no means perfect, we feel we are attempting to improve our liaison and that the children are aware of our links and welcome them. As our efforts have increased, we have encountered fewer children with transfer problems. There may be many other reasons for this. But if nothing else, the primary and secondary schools now have a much greater understanding of each other's work and problems.

Combating illiteracy

John Bald

"That timetable", pronounced the man from County Hall, "is a statement of your educational aims as a school." I started. How simple I was, I thought, to have seen "that timetable" as no more than a large, faintly duplicated sheet on the wall which said where everybody was and told the deputy head when he could nobble people's free periods.

The deputy education officer smiled: "Of course, if you cannot fulfil these ideals for any reason, then the timetable—indeed, the curriculum—must be modified to make the best use of the resources which you have available."

We all shuddered quietly. It was September 1973 and the gentleman from administration was, we knew, after our free periods to cover the London teacher shortage. We were not amused and he did not get them—at least, not all of them.

But that remark about the timetable has stayed in my mind. Could six periods of English, five of maths, three each of history and geography, four of science and the rest really constitute a statement of educational aims? These last, it seemed to me, depended essentially on people, and existed whether or not there was a timetable, and indeed at times in spite of it. I was, you may have guessed, in my first year.

There were plenty of people around to agree with me, and even to try to push me a lot farther. "The curriculum", said the head of English, "is the staff." Ah, so. I was to be an education in myself; this appealed to my vanity. Another colleague in the English department was still bolder—"Education", she announced, "is about relationships." Something inside me said "no", but even the most deferential "Yes, but . . ." was broadly turned aside. "New teachers", she said, "are insecure. Experience is what's required."

That Christmas I met the head of French from a large comprehensive school near Leicester. He enjoyed his work. "A pastoral job", he affirmed, content. I tried to picture Mr Homes, who taught me French, saying that. The gown or the shepherd's crook? My disquiet seemed to be growing.

When I got back, the fifth year were choosing their sixth-form courses. A boy told me they were not doing history any more, that he had been told to do English instead, as, it would be "better for him, anyway". That, I think, settled it. Prejudiced, effete, lower-middle-class-pseudo-academic I might be, but that lad had the right to do A level history if he wanted to. Something was wrong.

I eventually moved to a school in South London which by most criteria had far less potential. The attainment of the intake would rank with the worst in the country. Our reading survey revealed no more than around 10 per cent of the first year boys with reading ages of 11 or better. The school was enormous, with well over 1,300 boys, and not so much as one football pitch on the site.

The staff were best described as embattled. The cane was virtually the only punishment, and the children were not spoiled by the sparing of it. Yet it seemed to me of vital importance to organize and impart to the children some knowlege which would be of use to them. There was such destructiveness, and the children were in such an abyss of ignorance, that any chance to do something constructive had to be seized.

When a teacher in this kind of school decides to do someting, the only people likely to realize it are the teacher and the pupils. The grammar school teacher with the bright fifth year could get the reward for his hard work in O levels. If Billy and I work like men possessed to get his reading age up from, say, sevenish to nineish, we are likely to be the only two who know about it.

A considerable proportion of the school population do not and never have passed exams. How, I wonder, could a core curriculum and stricter inspection help them?

Paradoxically, I think it might. No one could imagine the Government introducing the kind of rigid exam system used in France, for the simple reason that once a person reaches the age and level of ability at which they can take exams, the British system is infinitely more humane and more efficient. You would probably have to take the structure of higher education to pieces in order to impose the new system and at least some of these establishments have their means of resistance.

No, what is much more feasible and desirable, is for the Government to act to stop the constant flow of illiterate children from the primary schools into the comprehensives. A nationally agreed standard for primary schools, coupled with the right blend of assistance and criticism should they fail, has become a matter of urgency for the success of comprehensive education.

Until the efficiency of primary schools is improved, the standards of the comprehensive are bound to remain where they are. And that is not much of a prospect for the potential sixth-former.

John Bald is head of the remedial department, Stepney Green School, London.

Drawing in English

James Rye

A quite uncommon use for drawing in English lessons is to use it as a means of note-making in planning, before writing is begun. There are obvious limitations. Drawing can only be used in planning where children are being asked to write on a topic that can be easily visualized. The kind of writing most likely to benefit from drawing is description.

Suppose a child is asked to describe something from his own experience, a person that he knows, for example. Before writing, one of the first thing he does is to remember that person in his mind's eye. Having pictured the person, he tries to record it by translating his remembered image into writing. However, what is remembered lacks permanence, and may have to be recalled time and time again; the details may be incomplete; and certain aspects may remain unclear though the general impression may be quite strong.

There seem to be several advantages in asking the child to quickly sketch the particular person he is to describe before he starts to write. As he draws he will see the need to clarify details that have been rather hazy in his image before he can put them on to paper, and he will almost certainly remember details that have not been included in his image. In drawing he is being asked to contemplate and expand an image before translat*ing it into* writing. By transferring a representation of his image on to paper, what he has to translate into writing should be more vivid.

Drawing may also be used as part of a stimulus for writing. Pupils could sketch a skeleton outline, and then be encouraged to imagine and write about what is left hidden. A pupil's drawing may not provide the same stimulation as the photographs that abound in anthologies and public examinations. However, a simple drawing can be used as part of the process of stimulating ideas. It gives the pupils something concrete and external for their imagination to work on.

A class of 13-year-olds were asked to sketch a map of a desert island before describing it. One boy produced the following key to go with his map:

(1) The entrance to the island which I found as I drifted in.
(2) The place where I buried my dead dog Pat. He did not survive the shipwreck.
(3) The swamp where I stumbled when I was exploring the island.
(4) Where I used to get water to drink.
(5) The beginning of my house.
(6) The spot where I used to keep a huge fire burning at night, in case anyone spotted me.
(7) My hideout.

Details of the island and how the boy arrived there and survived have begun to be formulated in his mind. In a literal sense he is not describing what he has drawn on paper, but the request for him to draw has started him thinking.

The pupils then went on to write more fully about the island. Of course, the pupil would have been able to write an imaginative account without his map and key. But they were a helpful aid as a starter to writing.

The request to draw should always be subservient to the task of writing. The pupils need to be given time to adjust to new demands of the drawing task that are being made of them. Experience of drawing in other subjects may lead some of them to spend ages producing elaborate drawings, which become an end in themselves. However, in spite of difficulties and obvious limitations, drawings can help the work being done in English classrooms.

James Rye teaches English at Downham Market Secondary Boys School, Norfolk.

The London Music Shop and 50 years of music education

Fifty-two years ago the London Music Shop was started by two employees of a music publisher who, realising the limitations of one publisher's catalogue, decided to open a small shop in which the best from each publisher's works would be recommended and sold—particularly to students.

In half a century, the only thing that has changed is the size and scope of the London Music Shop which today includes music and instruments for children from pre-school age up to professional standards. The concept behind its humble beginnings remains exactly the same.

Today the London Music Shop is not just one shop—but three different addresses each of which, whilst being a complete music centre in its own right, specialises in one particular aspect of school music.

The hub of the whole operation is at Valmar Road in South East London. For here are the mail order, administration and despatch departments which keep schools, colleges and individual musicians throughout the U.K. supplied with music and instruments.

A large modern warehouse keeps a tremendous range of instruments in stock—ready to be tested, packed and despatched at a moment's notice. There is even a telephone ring back service to encourage teachers to telephone their orders or enquiries even though they may be at the other end of the country. Valmar Road also has a showroom where any of the London Music Shop's extensive range may be purchased.

At 218, Great Portland Street, is the more public face of the London Music Shop—the long established London showroom. This in fact is the direct development of the original London Music Shop which started in nearby Wigmore Street.

Although specialising in educational instruments—the London showroom is a complete music store in its own right and is of course used by thousands of amateur and professional musicians quite outside the field of schools music. It is also shortly to be extended—making it one of the larger stores in the country. The London showroom sells instruments, sheet music and books, records and cassettes.

Although all the London Music Shop addresses sell sheet music—it is to the West Country branch at 14 The Strand, Exmouth, Devon—that sheet music orders are normally addressed.

The Exmouth store specialises in sheet music and it is here that Leonard Welton the L.M.S. Consultant with a lifetime's work in school music behind him has built up a magnificent collection of music and books. A recently published series of booklets acts as an index to the most recommended pieces helping teachers and other customers to make the best choice for their individual needs.

Like the London showroom—the London Music Shop in Exmouth is an extremely comprehensive music store which, apart from mail orders from all over the U.K., draws upon personal customers from a wide area of the West Country.

There is nothing else quite like the London Music Shop. Its three addresses comprise the largest and most comprehensive musical instrument and sheet music service to schools in Britain.

But it is more than just an efficient business. It has become something of an institution to music teachers. It is a catalyst for new ideas and instruments in musical education. It attends educational meetings throughout the country with exhibitions of music and instruments. It even recommends and contacts music authorities in all fields to organisers of meetings, classes and courses.

Above all—behind the modern facades of its showrooms and the businesslike efficiency of its despatch department—the London Music Shop is still a bastion of those old fashioned values of personal service and reliability.

Bert Woollatt–Roving Ambassador of Valmar Road

The high regard with which the London Music Shop is held throughout all parts of the country, despite being mainly a London based operation, is due in great measure to the energies and personality of Director Bert Woollatt.

Although he was Manager of the London Showroom for some years, today you will find Bert Woollatt in the comparatively anonymous building in Valmar Road, South East London, that houses the London Music Shop's Mail Order Department.

For it is here that the London Music Shop has its real links with the 40 thousand schools and colleges throughout England, Scotland and Wales—plus a few from overseas. And it is here that the gregarious personality and extensive knowledge of Bert Woollatt can be put to best use.

The phrase that occurs again and again when talking to Bert about the London Music Shop is "personal service". This may sound a rather contradictory ideal for a mail order operation—but if the administration remains firmly in London—he certainly does not.

His diary is packed with meetings and exhibitions all over the country. Sunderland EDA, the NUT Conference in Eastbourne, Caerleon NUT, London Head Teachers—plus various exhibitions organized by the British Educational Equipment Association—of which the London Music Shop are members.

Bert Woollatt

Bert Woollatt is an extremely approachable man—which is just as well. Because when he's not off to Wales or Scotland with a car full of music and instruments—he seems to be talking non-stop into the receiver of the nearest telephone.

The telephone is naturally seen as an important part of Bert's "personal service". So much so that the London Music Shop operate an STD ring-back advisory service from Valmar Road. So that a music teacher out of London who wants to discuss a problem that may take some time can give his or her number and a brief outline of the problem—and Bert or Peter Browning—his assistant—will ring them back armed with facts, figures and prices and a wealth of knowledge about musical instruments.

For Bert is himself an accomplished musician—principally a woodwind man who can also turn his hand to brass and drums. Music is his great love and he counts himself lucky to have made his career in the music business—15 years of it with the London Music Shop. There is little he doesn't know about music—particularly schools music.

Asked about current trends in schools music Bert is adamant that cost is one of the most crucial factors shaping musical policy at the moment.

"Schools everywhere are having their budgets cut. Music teachers are having to become very much more cost conscious. Quite often a teacher will ring me up with X amount of pounds to spend and part of our service is working out a package that will give them the best possible value for their money—according to their individual needs. Naturally, we can give generous discounts to educational establishments."

"As far as instruments are concerned—significant new trends are perhaps the mini-keyboard—electric pianos and organs which are now becoming more acceptable as alternatives to the piano. But without a doubt—one of the most popular new melody instruments for young children is the Melodica. Particularly the new Cassotto models which have a very woodwind like tone."

While Bert Woollatt is acting Ambassador for the London Music Shop—fellow director Les Collins is the Company Secretary who runs a very efficient administration at Valmar Road, and oversees the administration of the group generally.

"Most orders we receive get a return of post service", says Bert, "because for 90 per cent of the orders we receive, we have the instruments here in stock."

"We offer a repair service for instruments as well—using very skilled craftsmen. In fact, everybody at the London Music Shop is very qualified and knowledgeable and able to give out first class advice. But people ask for me—partly because they know me and also because I encourage them to ask for me. I make it my business to get personally involved with as many of our customers as I can."

"I've now got an assistant—Peter Browning, who is a big help and keeps me up to date with things when I've been away for a few days."

So if you have any enquiries about instruments, if you'd like an exhibition of instruments and music for schools or if you'd like the name of someone who'd speak at a meeting or run a course for you—ask for Bert Woollatt. You may have to wait for a bit—but he's sure to have the answers.

Sonor courses for music teachers

The London Music Shop features in its catalogue the full range of Sonor Orff instruments, a range which has become accepted in the U.K. as a leader in the Orff field, particularly in terms of quality allied to a very wide range. The Sonor Orff instruments therefore are ideal for use with the traditional Carl Orff methods, but owing to the involvement with Professor Berghese one of the initiators of the "Orff" movement and the desire to keep pace with developing trends all over the world including the U.K., the instrumental range has been expanded widely to cover all requirements. For instance, although chime bars are not in the traditional Carl Orff programme, Sonor have developed the chime bars aspect to such an extent that they have the widest range available now both in rosewood and metal alloy bars, in addition to new developments with "Palisono" fibre glass material. Palisono material is also another recent development in the Sonor range, in that they are now introducing Palisono fibre glass bars as an alternative to Rosewood on their Xylophones and deep bass bars Rosewood, an increasingly scarce commodity, will continue to be used of course, but it is expected that the Palisono bars will be also very widely used as their tonal qualities are quite outstanding.

Every year the Sonor organization organizes a series of courses for teachers in Germany and from all over the world. This year, a number of British music advisors etc. are already booked to attend an English-speaking course. The following is an account of a previous Sonor course in Germany by Derek Pearson.

"Taubstumm Kinder sind Augen Menschen": with this very neat and meaningful phrase in German a course in "Music Therapy for Deaf and Multiple Handicapped Children" began in Fredeburg, West Germany. An approximately similar translation could be "Deaf Children are Eye People", a very apt and fitting remark that is true. The course concentrated on the work of Paul Nordoff and Clive Robbins in this field. While intensive and practical in content it afforded the opportunity to discuss problems and ideas internationally. How similar our problems are and ideas for tackling them abound. Our only real enemies are time and facilities.

Claus Bang, a Danish Music Therapist and Class Teacher, was in charge of the course. This included the musical (rhythm and pitch) treatment of voice or speech therapy using the deep "Klangstübe" or resonator bars that the "SONOR" Company of Germany have developed. These are available in the range c to f but recently this has been extended down in pitch to the F below, i.e. an octave and a fifth below middle C on the piano. A major 3rd (e.g. F-A or C-E) is chosen from these bars and with teacher and pupil armed with 2 beaters each they play a game in which rhythm and pitch are used to copy the inflection and stress of speech. At first simply using "BA" on a strong accent and "ba" on a weak one with "BA" being pitched on, say, E and "ba" on C. (The major 3rd interval).

The extension of this game in speech and allied with drawings, slides and colours is fairly obvious, the main labour being the back-up software in the form of overhead transparencies, slides etc., and the use and extension of these ideas has also been worked on.

The play songs of Nordoff and Robbins were sung, played and discussed with the main thought being "how different ideas, sections etc., can be brought into this song! As this was being done another interesting thing happened. Because all the songs are in English a translation was made into German so that the German and Austrian members of the course (which meant nearly everybody) ended up with a German edition of nearly the entire collection. In all the songs the rhythms of the music were adapted to suit the speech rhythms of the words, phrases etc., and even dialectic variations were noted in some cases. This is a point that is very important to Nordoff and Robbins, the preservation of the characteristic rhythm of the speech. The music may highlight it but must not give it an incorrect emphasis.

The point being made that whether English, or any other language, if there is a local dialect that has a very distinctive phrase to fit a song then use it even if the rhythm of the song has to be slightly altered to suit. A major alteration in rhythm or involving a melodic change would invalidate any benefit to be gained from the local familiarity. A comment passed on from a group of children who had sung a lot of the songs was very amusing! "We like singing these (songs), because we don't have to think about speaking!" Perhaps a sign of the total commitment involved in this at different levels.

Space, like time, runs out and we have not touched the improvising of dance responses to rhythmic stimuli provided either on prerecorded types or through the varied rhythmic patterns available on some modern electronic organs. These could go on to vocal responses, non-pitched instrumental and even pitched instrumental responses.

It was a fascinating and rewarding course and all the participants from Germany, Austria, Switzerland, Holland, America, England and Scotland must I am sure be grateful to the Link Organization in Germany for making it possible.

P.T.A's provide the notes

By John Brown, Chairman, Garden Suburb Infant and Junior Schools Joint P.T.A.

Money, money, money, may not be still at the top of the charts but, at this time of public spending cuts, many primary schools would be very hard pressed to keep up any sort of music provision if the PTA money was withdrawn. The role of the PTA in support of the music teaching in a school is threefold.

By fundraising, the PTA provides a grant for the purchase of instruments, and its equipment and music supplements the often meagre LEA capitation and enables the school to offer a much wider choice of instrument to the children, and alleviates the difficulties that arise when too many children are chasing too few instruments. The difficult business of selection is avoided and instruments that would be too large a share of the school's capitation can be provided and used by children of any socio-economic background. The purchase by the PTA of sheet music, tutor books and books on the history of music, is an area of involvement that should not be overlooked. Financial support of this kind will mean that a much more balanced music teaching programme can be offered; and with that in mind, PTA's may well consider the use of the many instrument hire services at present available. Hire of instruments gives the music teacher much more flexibility; from year to year the talents, interests and trends change demands and a PTA/School that has invested all its funds in string instruments in 1977 would look to the miracle of the bread and fishes to make its two clarinets stretch to the twenty aspiring young wind players of 1978.

The second area of PTA support in the music work of the school centres on sponsorship: underwriting school music concerts, visits by professional musicians and visits by the children to concerts and recitals can all be the financial responsibility of the PTA, not only in a passive way but by initiating and setting up such activities. The often overlooked talents of many of the parents themselves are worth pursuing: a concert given by a parent has a particular appeal.

Finally, support by the PTA for the school's music work can be effective in encouraging the school to make music a part of the school's many functions, those that do not usually have music items as part of their programme. Open nights, open days, prizegivings, bazaars, fairs and even jumble sales can all benefit by the introduction of some musical offerings and the key to this may be the vociferous support by the parents of such a plan followed by their full and generous support on the day.

Money, money, money, may seem to be the message. True, but the advantages of the PTA/School partnership in music are social as well as educational.

The store with a long past—and a big future

The London Showroom of the London Music Shop at 218 Great Portland Street is shortly to be extended—placing it amongst the country's largest music stores.

The extended premises will be taken up primarily with a new department selling amplifiers, speakers and other electrical equipment.

While it will continue to specialize in schools music—the new department will make the store fully comprehensive—catering for almost every type of musician, amateur and professional.

The present showroom is just a stone's throw from the original London Music Shop. This was situated in Wigmore Street—where two sisters by the name of Moon ran what was then primarily a sheet music shop.

In 1953—the business was taken over by Mr Leonard Welton—an excellent violinist and a man totally dedicated to music education. Mr. Welton and his wife extended the business to take in instruments and set up a mail order operation which quickly proved very successful.

For the next ten years, Mr. and Mrs. Welton without any additional staff managed to increase the turnover fifty fold—while still carrying on with Mr. Welton's school lectures and demonstrations.

Some of their young customers then were later to become international concert artists. "I remember", says Leonard Welton, "that Daniel Barenboim used to race up our narrow stairs as a schoolboy in short trousers and a young girl called Jacqueline du Pré came in for her cello lesson every Friday".

In 1962 they appointed Bert Woollatt to help and develop the instrumental and mail order side of the London Music Shop. Bert Woollatt was a man who shared their interest in school music and their basic belief in personal service and integrity.

Music & schools today

What are your fellow music teachers doing in schools today? We invited educationists and music teachers from different types of school to tell us of their activities and experiences. Introduction by Stephen S. Moore M.B.E., Secretary of the Schools Music Association.

In this the fiftieth year since the scheme for non-competitive schools music festivals, devised by the late Ulric Brunner, OBE, first began at Bridgnorth in 1927, it is perhaps an opportune moment to step back and review the situation of music in schools as it is to-day.

In the 1930s music made its most spectacular advance in our history, and since 1946 the same has happened with instrumental music in particular. The unfortunate break was the War which disrupted the continuity to the progress being made in 1939.

There have been many schemes and plans evolved for aiding music teaching, and the time is perhaps overdue when an assessment should be made of what has proved to be helpful, and what has failed.

For music to be the outstanding and vital subject in the school curriculum which is its rightful place in the interests of the true education of every child, teachers must know how to present it in the way which will appeal to all children and to make a co-ordinated plan with their colleagues so that both children and teachers know where they are going and have ultimate goals. Music must also be inter-linked with other subjects so that every child has a balanced education and is equipped to live a profitable and useful life and not merely to exist.

COMPREHENSIVE MUSIC EDUCATION

by George Fitzgerald of Stepney Green Comprehensive, East London.

Stepney Green School is a comprehensive in the East End of London having approximately 1,000 boys on roll.

My own connexion with it began almost exactly one year ago and I quickly became aware of the enormous—really enormous—interest in music, particularly instrumental music.

Thanks to a particularly sympathetic, generous (financially!) Head, and a most generous Authority, we obtained a large quantity of both new and fully restored and repaired instruments and then embarked on a vigorous instrumental teaching programme. Peripatetic teachers of the very highest calibre are in this school five days per week teaching brass, woodwind and guitar. All the brass instruments that we possess are taught—trumpet, trombone, tuba, euphonium, french horn. Saxophone, clarinet, flute in the woodwind section, and guitar—which is immensely popular—is taught to some 60 boys during the week. Some 180 boys are currently learning instruments in the school, with practice going on virtually all day, in both morning and afternoon breaks, lunch-time, after school and at home using instruments borrowed from the school.

I encourage any boy in the school to apply for lessons on an instrument and provided the boy observes a few very simple rules concerning lesson release (done by means of a simple printed form signed by the subject teacher), he can start as soon as a vacancy occurs. We thus give all boys the opportunity to learn—BUT—only the opportunity. Progress is constantly reviewed and unless progress is made and practice maintained from week to week, lessons are discontinued. We take boys for a trial period of approximately three to four weeks, when an assessment is made by myself and the peripatetic teacher concerned.

Our Prize-Day concert in Queen Mary College (The People's Palace) in October last year included the following:
two pieces by Wind Band trumpet duo by two 6th year boys pianoforte solo by 1st year boy a group of guitar, melodica, xylo/metallophone players a group of solo brass items by 1st year boys (who are all being entered for Grade 3 trumpet, Assoc. Board shortly, after learning for considerably less than one year) a brass solo by a 6th year boy clarinet trios, etc., etc., which might serve to show the enthusiasm and hard work of the boys.

Our after school activities are constant, a clarinet group on Monday, melodica/piano group on Tuesday, rehearsal for a musical play on Wednesday, a "session" with a group of very keen guitar players on Thursday and a theory group, Assoc. Board (ever growing!), on Friday.

It will be seen that the emphasis in all our activities, both inside the classroom and outside it, is on actually "doing". A distinguished H.M.I. of music once delivered a lecture in the Royal Academy of Music on "school music" and I well remember his reference to two kinds of activity: writing—which he said (in the context of the music class) was "about music" and actually creating, or doing something, i.e. singing or playing which was "music".

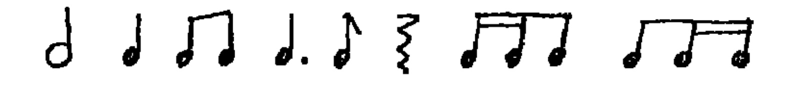
This system has unearthed a very great deal of what might be called "dormant talent" and we have a very large number of boys who I hope will be sent forward for an instrumental award (ILEA scheme) later on. Boys come to us, of course, as is more often than not the case in the secondary school, with little or no musical knowledge and so I start on the teaching of music reading straight away in the first year. I receive unstreamed classes for music in the whole of the first year (approx. 30 boys per class) and all of the second year classes. All of these boys have one music period per week lasting one hour. In the third year I see groups of approx. 20 boys who are in rotating groups spending so many weeks with me before moving on to other subject groups. A 4th year minor option is in force for the first time, a new venture which will become fairly big next academic year.

In teaching the reading of music, I am undeterred by some streams of modern educational thought, and it may be thought—I have heard on occasions this view expressed from the most surprising quarters!!—that it is not necessary in the teaching of music to bother with the actual reading of the notes. Well, one can only relate from one's own experience. If it isn't done or some attempt made to get the basic idea of how to relate the printed symbol one with another, what is the position of a pupil who decides to learn instruments? The peripatetic teacher is then to occupy himself with the task of teaching music reading in addition to the teaching of the actual instrument. In a shared lesson of 30 minutes with two or three pupils this must be a mistake.

It is, I think, worthy of note that in this school where we have this minor option in music and where, as I have said, we anticipate a large number of boys opting for music as a possible examination study, the lack of previous teaching of what I might call the "basics" really shows up, in that in the 4th year, boys come forward with little or no knowledge of what we are teaching to the 1st/2nd year, and so one has to start right back at the beginning, a situation that we all know is applicable to very many pupils in schools everywhere.

We took to the melodica at an early stage, both for use in the classroom and for a more specialized melodica group which meets after school hours. I have always regarded the melodica as a really excellent musical instrument educationally as well as recreationally, particularly as a means of introducing the keyboard to pupils. It is important, I think, to realize that it is much better for a child to actually hold a "real" keyboard in his hand rather than crane his neck to see the piano at the front of the room. I have, up to recent times, always used the Piano 26/27 models which I have always found to be excellent in every way. Recently, however, we have purchased the new "Cassotta" model and this instrument, resembling as it does an organ, is extremely popular in the school. The development of this instrument is, I believe, very important in musical education since its tone in ensemble—or even solo—work is most woodwind like, and ought to impress the most hardened "purist" who prefers nothing but an orchestral instrument.

Using the instruments, I write short patterns, rhythms for the class to play, and have recently made a series of cards which have written on them a few bars introducing various notes and note-groups:



Each boy has a card and attempts to play it, passing it on when completed and receiving another card. I find that this is quite popular and I usually begin this by getting the players to play the rhythm on one note or tapping or clapping the rhythm before playing. We spend part of each music period doing some singing, at the moment (since there was a considerable period when no singing was done) not too ambitiously and I use the Brace "Something to Sing" (excellent) and am not afraid to include popular songs of the moment, since as we all know (or should know!) when you are making sure that music is getting across to as many as possible, you must keep up with current developments and not behave—as a famous College lecturer once said—as if all music stopped with the death of Johannes Brahms!!!

I approach the matter of what is known as "musical appreciation" with great care. I use the tape-recorder in listening, by recording short, very short extracts from the music of the "masters" (how very dated that word sounds!!) and I never expect classes to sit still listening to a complete side of an LP!! Just a tune or two to possibly remember, bearing in mind that we are trying to introduce the world of music to children not ramming it down their throats! This is, of course, helped by the ILEA scheme of introducing parties of children to the Concert Hall and—more recently—to English National Opera, the latter visit incidentally, being most enthusiastically received, even though the works were performed in modern dress!!

This seems to me to be a pretty sound basis on which to work and it is my hope that at Stepney Green School we in fact "do music".

PRIMARY SCHOOLS MUSIC

by Myron Hrynkow, Deputy Headmaster, St. James Junior School, Whitehaven, Cumbria.

After five years working in West Cumbria, I have found that the reception juniors arrive at our junior schools having had wide musical experiences. These include singing of songs, rounds, nursery rhymes, rhythmical word games, clapping, dancing, playing simple rhythm accompaniment to tunes, some work with simple ostinato accompaniments and of course listening and moving to music.

The most common instruments found in local infant schools are chime bars, glockenspiels, xylophones, tambourines, maracas, castanets, wood blocks, triangles, drums and cymbals. Most children seem to have had some time actually playing with these instruments and I feel that musical spontaneity and creativity cannot be achieved until children have had ample opportunity to discover the various qualities and noises of these different instruments. This is a developing aspect of work in infant schools and a very welcome extension of the experience gained in the earliest school years.

While working at Seaton Junior School, Workington, I continued this work by ensuring that children had the chance to play, experiment and practise with our musical instruments, especially at break times. The first and second year junior children followed programmes like "Time and Tune" and "Music Time" and also learnt to sing rounds and more complicated children's songs. At this stage percussion work was of a simple rhythm type.

Songs and tunes were used with simple ostinato, chime and untuned percussion accompaniments of 1-3 or 4 notes only. With this background first year children were also taught to play recorder concentrating mainly on the notes G—high D. Formal musical notation was introduced for this work and a lot of music had to be composed to suit their ability and needs, as commercial sources generally tended to be graded too steeply. Contrived ostinato and rounds were another useful way of teaching note values and timing.

From the second year onwards, a wider range of instruments was introduced. Children were given the option of playing tenor and soprano recorders or treble and sopranino recorders, the sopranino recorders of course being preferred by children with smaller hands.

The diversity of recorder types meant that the recorder band produced an interesting mixture of tones. The music played was either home made or from other sources or year group music such as "Singing Together" and "Music Workshop" (BBC). All music was rewritten in three or four parts and according to ability. Alto and soprano glockenspiels, bass-soprano xylophones and chime bars were used for melody, ostinato and chord accompaniments.

Tuned percussion was varied and was shown to advantage when engaged in Carl Orff type music-making, where instruments of varying pitch are used to create rich sound pictures and tonal qualities, the music being home made or children's fabrications of pentatonic tunes and ostinatos. Incidentally it was not always necessary to use a pentatonic scale. Children given 5-6 notes of perhaps a minor scale, with a few chords to choose from, can make up interesting and fusable ostinato tunes.

Untuned percussion was also more varied and although it is often a useful exercise to allow children to make their own percussion instruments, I feel that having the commercial equivalent handy allows room for appreciation of quality of sounds and workmanship.

At my present school, St James Junior, Whitehaven, I am continuing with this type of work at upper junior level and am working with guitars, soprano recorders, melodicas and zither harps. I find that melodicas have striking tonal qualities and certainly add another dimension to instrumental work. Children find melodicas as easy to play as recorders and quickly adapt to the keyboard arrangement of fingering, especially if used with a mouthpiece extension. They provide a reedy background when used for accompaniments and sound lively, solo or grouped for melody playing.

With a good range of instruments and a lot of group work and coordination it is a small step from music groups to a school orchestra. The groups at St James combine to provide assembly music, concerts and a lot of creative music, and Carl Orff type music is used to supplement ventures in drama, art and craft and language. In these ventures children record their tunes/sound effects either in a formal or personalized notation for later performance or taping with written work.

Two views on Music Therapy

Kate Baxter—lecturer and formerly Music Advisor to Cambridgeshire

"I would say that music is a major part of my life—and I would not go without music for anything in the world."

Strong words from a severely physically handicapped 15-year-old boy declaiming his love of music; this would be echoed by most of our "special" children if they could speak for themselves.

Many of them do, however, in the recent publication "Hearts Hands and Voices" (OUP: the above quote is an extract). Author David Ward is writing about his findings as organizer of the project—Music in the Education of Slow Learners. This Carnegie course sponsored venture has already "sparked off" teachers' courses, publications, a few specialist teaching appointments and spotlighted the incalculable contribution that music can and does make in special education.

To attempt to mirror what is happening nationally, in detail, would be impossible, but here are some pieces of the "mosaic". In every home, school, hospital or centre there are parents, teachers, nurses and therapists working with children with a vast range of handicap—so there is a vast range of music-making!

Instrumentalists, singers and dancers can be seen at Festivals and Concerts deriving enormous pleasure from their musical achievement. The late Philip Bailey of Merseyside was an early pioneer in working with handicapped young people and proved "They can make Music" (OUP).

As a master-maker of gadgets he enabled many youngsters to play instruments.

Instruments requiring less technical skill now abound, from the pitched percussion (refined by Carl Orff) to the autoharp, chordomonica, melodica and kazoo. These portable and more easily playable aids to the music scene give heart to the non-pianist and offer opportunity for improvization.

Making one's own music, linked with drama, language and art, produces astounding responses from severely subnormal children. Teachers without specialist skills are often the ones who can initiate and sustain this rewarding approach, because they choose simple ideas and fit them round the children.

The Spastics Society promotes courses to encourage these ideas, as do the DES, some l.e.a.s and Colleges of Education, and the Orff-Schulwerk Society.

The name Rudolph Steiner must emerge at this point, with the powerful contribution his ideas have made in special schools both here and abroad. Therapy in music for handicapped children and the names Nordoff and Robbins are synonymous (sad to hear that Paul Nordoff died recently). Individual and group music therapy has a vital part to play in the rehabilitation of the mentally ill. The British Society for Music Therapy undertakes professional training and disseminates relevant information through its publications.

And what of the profoundly deaf child? Nora Wilkinson (organizer of the recent Leverhulm project "Practical Aspects of the Curricular Needs of the profoundly deaf child aged 4-8") writes of "the enjoyable disciplines involved in rhythmic movement, drama, songs and instrument playing". Stressing their immense value in linguistic and emotional development she continues: "We have become convinced that if a consistent programme of this kind is carried out as an integral part of the curriculum, a number of benefits are likely to accrue."

Programmed learning is probably seen at its best in the Conductive education designed by Professor Peto of Hungary.

Successfully practised in a few schools for cerebral palsied children, this method relies on teacher-therapists who integrate all areas of learning in a group situation.

Control of abnormal movement patterns via rhythmic speech are based on a principle of Rhythmic Intention. Speech and active movement are linked over a count of five, thus providing a pathway from the intention to the goal.

The vital part of movement in our lives cannot be underestimated. It is particularly so for a handicapped child. Some of the country's leading movement specialists have contributed immeasurably in helping teachers to meet this fundamental need.

Interest and support from professional musicians, publishers, manufacturers and Music Advisors, make a further contribution to the "mosaic". James Blades, to name but one professional musician, has "struck the right note" on so many occasions with his percussion demonstrations to handicapped children. Elsewhere in this feature too is a summary of the work done by Daphne Kennard of the Disabled Living Foundation. We all know what can be achieved through music.

The challenge to handle elemental music-making must be met by a larger proportion of the task-force, already engaged in the care and teaching of handicapped children. This needs courage on the part of the individual. Vital too, is the support from every agency and authority. Training programmes and materials are essential for this growth, if we are to meet the appeal implicit in the opening quotation of this appraisal.

Daphne Kennard, formerly Music Officer, Disabled Living Foundation.

Have you ever wondered what happens when a young physically handicapped person leaves a special school and is keen to continue the music so excitingly started at school? Perhaps a leading part has been played in a pantomime or the choir has been a major interest; maybe an instrument has been learnt (even though it has been played in an unorthodox fashion in order to overcome the handicap); records (discs or cassettes) may have been available to play in leisure hours or attendance at concerts could have been part of the normal school programme. How is it possible to find out about music societies, youth centres, evening classes, music libraries and concerts, near to your home, when first moving from special school into the post-school world? Especially if, say, walking is difficult and you don't know where to start looking anyway.

These are some of the problems that the Music Panel of the Disabled Living Foundation have been coming to terms with in their recent three-year practical project on "Access to Music for the physically handicapped schoolchild and school leaver". As project officer I travelled to various parts of the country to help musicians, teachers, club leaders, further education officers, careers officers, social workers, therapists, librarians and many others do something positive to ensure that physically handicapped children and those leaving school, could be involved with music if they were so inclined.

Everywhere, and at all levels, an encouraging response was received. People were very willing to learn—the musicians wanted to know how best to help handicapped youngsters and how to find them. The handicapped themselves wanted to know what music was possible and available and who could help them do it.

Many people from different disciplines are involved at various times with young handicapped people (e.g. workers from the health department, the social services, education, voluntary organizations for youth and for the disabled) and it is remarkably easy for a youngster to slip through the net with no one showing any interest in his leisure time. If, because of a handicap, the whole of your life is leisure time then this is very serious indeed.

In response to many requests for advice received during the three years ten resource papers were produced including a paper on working in music with handicapped people and training available and a list of music for one-handed pianists. These are available for a small charge from the Disabled Living Foundation, 346 Kensington High Street, London W14 8NS.

All the papers will be included as an appendix to the full report on the project which will be published by the DLF shortly. Also a booklet on music for physiotherapists is being printed now: "Music—to help disabled children to move" by Daphne Kennard and Moyna Gilbertson published by the Association of Paediatric Chartered Physiotherapists. Two other recently published books dealing with music with mentally handicapped children are "Hands and Hearts and Voices" by David Ward published by OUP at £1.95 and "Listen—let's make music" by Ann Hunt published by the Bedford Square Press at 70p. Copies of the full length report of the work done by David Ward's work on the Music for Slow Learners project based at Dartington College of Arts from 1968 to 1976 is available on hire from the Standing Conference for Amateur Music, 26 Bedford Square, London WC1B 3HU.

An important element in the DLF project has been the warmth and co-operation experienced amongst people working either directly or indirectly in music for handicapped youngsters. These include, in addition to those already mentioned, the British Society for Music Therapy, the Nordoff Music Therapy Centre, the Toy Libraries Association, PHAB (physically handicapped and able-bodied clubs), people at every level in education, and many others.

There is still an enormous amount of work to do, but if all organizations continue to work together in this way music for handicapped people will go from strength to strength.

Looking to the future

A final word by Jack Fryer, Music Adviser, Salford.

Those of us who are largely occupied with policy making in musical education constantly find ourselves concerned with the anomalies of attitudes towards music in this country. Lack of time causes us to take foreshortened views of what the future of music holds for children from the musical background we are giving.

We have discovered that children like to participate in music at some practical level or other. There is nothing new in this, we are merely returning to the customs that existed prior to the nineteenth and late eighteenth centuries. But we cannot, nor would we wish to, shake off the traditions of concert going and giving which is now with us. We must, therefore, be sure that we are able to offer suitable outlets for music making when children leave school.

It is certain that we must rethink much of our classroom syllabus to produce the attitudes of discrimination and discernment so necessary to produce in turn a thinking and enjoying public.

Obviously this brings us to the subject of the quality of teachers. We have many fine, natural teachers, but, in many cases I seriously doubt if they are being trained in the best possible way. Our music colleges talk mainly in terms of producing performers of the highest possible standard, and this is as it should be, but they also inculcate the extremely deleterious attitude that one should only teach if one fails as a performer. In the next breath they complain of the poor standard of teaching. What they fail to realize is that there is no difference in standard requirement, merely a difference in attitude.

The next matter to which policy makers are turning their attention is the syllabus content of public examinations and university or college of education courses. It is pleasant to see that there are signs of a complete reappraisal of content. University courses are diversifying. There is still a need for an academic course, but the need for a degree in instrumental playing, as offered in some countries, is beginning to be met, mainly because of pressures from youngsters who see that music is a matter of communication, not analysis. Also, what a boost to L.E.A. instrumental teaching it would be to have a practical "O" and "A" level!

These would seem to be the needs and the trends for the future, for education is not for the classroom, it is for life. How can we help to bring these developments about and give to those already begun, fresh impetus? We must put our own house thoroughly in order. We must remember that the discriminating public is created, ab initio, by right attitudes in the classroom. We must not allow the day to day work to become drudgery, we must keep up our musical standards and we must assess everything we do by musical criteria. In this way we can create incentives and demands for changes which will be heeded because of their vociferousness.

Michael Clarke at the latest Cockpit symposium

The Arts in Education—a new Contribution to the Great Debate.
Cockpit Lectures 1977.
Cockpit Theatre and Arts Workshop, March 19.

"Arts education involves the intelligence as well as feelings, discipline as well as creativity, exploration as well as celebration. But because more of the whole self is in play, it is argued, there is greater identification with the learning process, less alienation and more positive social interaction—all crucial contributions to any raising of standards or deepening of commitment", writes Alec Davison, Director of the Cockpit Theatre and Arts Centre and organizer of this years Cockpit Lectures.

How surprising, therefore, that in the current Great Education Debate hardly a murmur has been heard about the place of the arts in education. The curriculum is under attack: overgrown, offering choices it in fact does not fulfil, and frequently failing to provide even basic skills, it is ready for the surgeon's knife. Our knowledge of the significance of the arts and their place in education are greater than ever before. The moment is ripe for action — but what action?

Ernest Goodman, headmaster of Manchester High School of Art and chairman of the Schools Council Art Committee, reminded us that the curriculum was not something natural and inevitable but the product of competing interests. Describing the typical opposition that exists for most people between science and the arts, a choice between the logical, useful and verified and the emotional, useless and arbitrary, he accepted an essential difference but believed that both were vital to wholeness. He saw the expansion of choice on the curriculum as often masking a prejudice in favour of short-term utility.

The great Darwin, an enthusiast of poetry, music and art in his youth, realized, after devoting many years of his life to seeking general principles from heaps of facts, that a good part of him had become atrophied through impoverishment, what T. S. Eliot called a "disassociation of sensibility". Recent research into the structure and function of the brain, Goodman told us, shows that the separate and different roles played by the left and right-hand sides are both essential and dependent on each other for the best performance.

Keith Swanwick, Professor of music education at London University, agreed with Goodman on the integrative value of art activity but, more than the previous speaker, was keen to rid artistic expression of its negative attributes. It was not to be confused with either selfish exhibitionism of some notion of a pure self only waiting to be revealed t obe appreciated. Self-expression of this kind required no art. Expression in art might be cathartic, letting off of steam or public display but it also demanded clarification of communication—an aspect usually neglected in discussion. If art expresses anything at all it must possess some kind of semantic structure.

The two speakers seemed in further agreement in insisting on the necessity of some qualitative response in art, neatly expressed in Swanwick's reminder that aesthetic meant a concentration of sensation and perception and its opposite was anaesthetic, insensibility, that very numbness which Darwin had experienced. The adoption of quasi-scientific procedures by some recent artists Swanwick regarded as reducing the artist to a systems operator and art to the state where "new" and "experiment" were confused with fully realized artistic statements.

Ken Baynes, chairman of the National Association for Design Education, was to challenge this perhaps over-simplified separation of art and science. He began by relating how he had matured during the 1950s to find himself attracted to popular, so-called low culture and how he had, through his reading and experience, realized that culture was created as much from below as from above. It was a discovery that even ordinary, everyday things were as much a part of art history as those selected objects put in museums and galleries. The environment was the creation of us all and yet most of us had had little direct say in it.

An élitist culture had continued within the division of labour caused by the industrial revolution. The designer was now a specialist expected by some miracle of insight to solve problems that frequently involved us all. This splitting up of roles had turned the artist into a dreamer, the craftsman into a labourer and the user into a consumer. Standardization had certainly meant the cheap production of a lot of things but could anybody get what they wanted?

Insisting that we adopt an ethical, political stance towards education, Baynes recommended that we create an environment that suited us. Opposition between science and art became meaningless in such an education, particularly a design education. Goodman's division of the basic curriculum into mathematics/science, language and aesthetics, equally so, his aim of an "optimum level and distribution of human delight" was a romantic dream.

If disagreement had not registered itself by then, Albert Hunt, senior lecturer in community art at Bradford College and member of the Arts Council Drama Panel, drove home his points with brutal force. Schools were conservative, reactionary institutions that perpetuated social divisions. His work with secondary school pupils had shown that school was a kind of theatre, a ritual theatre, where the drama was communicated to the child directly. There the pupil learnt to do what others decided he should do, even when, where and how. Talk about freedom and democracy was hypocritical. Hunt totally rejected apolitical descriptions of either schools or education and advised teachers to find out exactly what type of society they lived in and in what way schools reflected it. He quoted from statistics and his own experience to show the inequalities in society and education. How could we, he asked, discuss notions like "quality of response" and "human delight" faced with these facts?

Hunt indirectly answered his own challenging question. His work with deprived pupils and others did often lead to a deeper involvement and a disciplined realization of their attitudes in dramatic form. It evidently changed the pupils both in the way others saw them and the way that they saw themselves. The material of the drama had been their own experience and the way they had understood it had shaped the finished thing.

They had shown quality of response and had produced human delight. Such evidence perhaps answered Swanwick's question whether to develop existing, local culture or to impose a culture from outside.

The development of "an intelligence of feeling" was what Goodman saw as the contribution of the arts to education, reflecting Alec Davison's statement, and Albert Hunt's experiences would seem to provide the evidence. Whatever truth there might be in this it is still not enough. Arts teachers must discover exactly what they mean by an intelligence of feeling and how best to cultivate it in their pupils.

If there was any agreement at all between these speakers it was that arts teachers should inform themselves thoroughly, unite and present their arguments as clearly as possible. A further opportunity to inform themselves is offered to arts teachers on June 24, when for the first time members of all the Schools Council Curriculum Development projects in the arts will share their findings and materials with teachers.

Spectacles of danserie

Rosemary Hartill

Last week the London Contemporary Dance Theatre opened a new season at Sadlers Wells. The dancers are on top form, displaying marvellous athleticism, balance and grace and handling difficult movement with confidence. But it is disappointing to see yet another season from this fine company where the standards of choreography fall short of the standards of dancing.

Premièred on the opening night was Night Watch, a work created by the experimental collaboration of Robert Cohan, Sue Davies, Robert North and Micha Bergese. In three sections—"Evening Star", "Midnight Sun", and "Palais at 4 a.m."—it charts the slow progress of the night through the half stages of dream and waking. It is a pleasant piece, with elements of play and relaxing passages of soothing rhythmic movement, but Bob Downes's soporific score and the, at times, indeterminate choreography invite a drowsy audience.

No one, however, could catnap during Jane Dudley's idiosyncratic solo blues sketch, Harmonica Breakdown. Created originally in 1938 round a score for harmonica and washboard, this enjoyable, though slight piece sends out waves of nervous energy that makes you want to get right out there and join in.

Robert Cohan's new ballet, Forests, has the feeling of a work put together without any strong creative commitment. It portrays life in a forest to the background of a wind soughing in the trees, overlaid by birdsong, a rainstorm, and, finally, distant animal cries. Despite individual images of interest and expressiveness, this overlong work falls back on uneasy transitions and fragmented development.

The last of the four premièred works—Robert North's Meeting and Parting—has ironic implications for a company so firmly founded on Martha Graham's method and philosophy. Uninhibitedly influenced by Jerome Robbins's Dances at a Gathering (in the repertoire of the Royal Ballet), it moves away from the earth-based Graham technique to the more lyrical balletic style. This work's new subtlety of pacing, humour and humanity must surely be the right direction for this choreographer.

Ballet Rambert's annual choreographic workshops were founded four years ago to provide an opportunity for experiment by new choreographers and design students from the Central School of Art and Design. The recent session, Collaboration 4, at the Jeannetta Cochrane Theatre, was on the whole uninspired, and it showed a slightly worrying turnover of dancers within the company. But the session was justified by two works: Kuyaiki by Gary Sherwood and Accident by Zoltan Imre.

In the language of the Incas, Kuyaiki means a formal declaration of love. Danced by two couples to the breathy, plaintive pipe sounds of pre-Columbian folk music, and stealing into the shadowy rituals of the sub-conscious, this is a sensitive, restrained and beautiful piece.

Accident opens with brutal shock effect. The curtain rises on the smoking, tangled wreck of a smashed car with two bodies strewn before it watched by two silent figures in black. To the hideous accompaniment of traffic noises and a blaring radio, the symbols of death draw on the victims to relive their jangled inhuman caricatured last moments. Despite a weak final section where the bodies are dragged back to their original positions, this is a truly disturbing and thought-provoking work with brilliant imaginative touches, as when the figures in black temporarily lose interest in the spectacle, becoming absorbed in a rapt, shared, childlike rocking movement. The work ends with the almost unbearably moving sound of Ferrier singing the Brahms Alto Rhapsody, jarred and distorted by interference from a news radio station.

Away from these metaphysical realms and back to the harsh realities of school outings, the Nonsuch Company last month presented a programme of medieval and Renaissance verse and court dance to an audience of schoolchildren at the Curtain Theatre in East London. This was a cut version of an anthology originally designed for adults, "celebrating the spirit of the Renaissance, with games of Love and Rivalry portrayed in dance and verse from twelfth-century Provence to sixteenth-century England".

What this means to the average 13-year-old who, as yet, has an undeveloped historical sense and knows nothing of Provence or courtly love or the Renaissance is hard to guess, and it was not surprising to see children clustering round their teachers in the interval, asking in a puzzled way what it was all about. For future presentation to schools, this programme needs radical rethinking and cutting, with a narrator to explain the background and to link the sections together.

Yet even in the programme's present ill-conceived state, the dance and music were so delightful and the company's enjoyment so evident that even the most cynical commentators among the kids stopped munching their sandwiches and swigging their Coca Cola to watch what was happening.

A new resurrection?

Peter Hebblethwaite

Who was Jesus?
BBC2. April 14, 9 pm.

Whether by accident or cunning design, Don Cupitt's Who was Jesus? was the perfect foil to Zeffirelli's Jesus of Nazareth. Cupitt demonstrated just why the Zeffirelli enterprise was doomed to failure. One simply cannot treat the Gospels uncritically as straightforward history, a blow by blow account of "what exactly happened". Not only that, but in the light of Cupitt's programme, Jesus of Nazareth became another instance of the endlessly varied process of mythologising Jesus that has gone on throughout 20 centuries of Christian history. "Many prefer the flamboyant Christ of faith", Cupitt conceded sadly, adding that "the historical Jesus still awaits his resurrection".

Now, at first blush, this might seem a most devastating onslaught on the "Founder of Christianity"—and many viewers will not have had time for a second blush. They might well feel that there is no need for sceptical humanists to enter the fray if a parade of professors of theology are generously prepared to conduct so undermining an analysis. Howls of anguished disappointment have already been heard from the pews: "They have taken away our Lord, and we do not know where to find him."

But such a response is over-hasty and it does not do justice to the positive aims of the programme. Don Cupitt's attempt in the middle part to reconstruct a picture of Jesus "as he really was" was convincing without claiming to be definitive and, from one point of view, highly conservative. For unlike those German scholars who have declared that the "Quest for the historical Jesus" is a vain will o' the wisp, he really believes that some progress can be made and some conclusions reached.

A major contribution has been made in this field by Jewish scholars who are sometimes less diffident than their Christian colleagues. Thus David Flusser presented Jesus as an anti-Zealot who preached the imminent Kingdom of God and believed himself to be the Messiah. The shattered ankles of a victim of first-century crucifixion brought vividly home the barbarous reality of the passion. Much of what we know about Jesus from the Gospels tallies with what is known from other sources.

The gap between scholars and ordinary Christians ought to have been narrowed by this programme. It could be reproached only for biting off more than anyone could possibly chew. But no one, presumably, is going to argue that because a little carefully packaged TV learning is a dangerous thing, ignorance should be left to sleep undisturbed. It is better that Christians and everyone else should come closer to the authentic Christ than that they should dream of him. One should not miss the follow-up discussion next Sunday on BBC 2.

The north-west and the south-west will be meeting to make music this weekend; Chetham's Hospital School of Music and Wells Cathedral School are taking part in an intensive five-day orchestral course, with John Eliot Gardiner as visiting conductor and with several specialist tutors.

The course began yesterday and will end on Monday with a concert given by the four chamber orchestras at 7.30 pm at Manchester College of Education, Long Millgate.

Let me take you down . . . .

Heather Neill

After seeing Strawberry Fields (Cottesloe at the National Theatre) I had a vivid dream that it was the result of improvisation work by a class of 14-year-olds. It could have been.

Stephen Poliakoff, only 24, already much admired and resident playwright at the NT last year, has written a piece about a potentially important subject: a right-wing party determined to save England from pollution (this apparently includes black immigrants) has members prepared to murder to achieve its ends. But as neither the party nor the two main characters who belong to it, neither the sequence of events nor the dialogue is for a moment credible, this does not matter very much.

The play's construction is like the motorway along which most of the action (inconsequential chatter which firmly keeps motivation unrevealed, drinks in caffs and two pistol shots) takes place: a straight line leading to the end of the road but with little in the way of landmarks, and Michael Apted's direction is suitably monotonous. There is an inescapable feeling that the writer, forced to produce something at the end of his year, put two characters, a fastidious middle-class girl (Jane Asher) and a freakishly imaginative youth Kevin (Stephen Rea), who claims to be going blind, together in a roadside caff in the hope that something dramatic would result from their complicity.

But nothing arises naturally. The playwright seems anxious to tell us as little as possible about the motivation of his characters so that the shots which mark the interval and the end of the play will come as a shock. Why should Charlotte coldbloodedly kill a policeman? An hour later she shoots a hitch hiker, Nick (Kenneth Cranham). He should, presumably, represent right-thinking people just like us, but the possibilities for political or philosophical argument between him and Charlotte come to nothing.

There are occasional flashes of Poliakoff's dexterity with language which make this an even sadder occasion. Kevin's description of a blood-and-guts film is hilarious in its extremity, and the incidental characters, like the cleaner, show signs of observation and sympathy.

The Cottesloe, an intimate box of a theatre, reminiscent of an Elizabethan inn-yard in shape, is a pleasant place except that all the sightlines are not equally good from the galleries.

GRAHAM WADE looks back at the history of Clapperboard

Clapperboard is the longest running television programme looking at the world of cinema in this country. It goes out on nearly the whole commercial network every [illegible] afternoon at 4.20 pm throughout the year, and in fact has not missed a single week since it first appeared way back in 1972. Produced by Granada, it has already clocked up more than 250 editions which have been made by a team—comprising Muriel Young (co-producer), Graham Murray (compiler) and Chris Kelly (interviewer)—who have been together from the start.

To begin with, Clapperboard was allowed a six-part trial run to slot into commercial television's children's hour, but this proved so popular almost overnight that its life was immediately extended and the programme has never looked back since. Muriel Young is the first to admit that this success is largely down to the commitment and sheer application of Graham Murray, who she describes as "the real Mr Clapperboard."

He combines the never-ceasing job of preparing the programmes with his main job as head of Granada's film research department. Looking back to those early days he confesses he regarded the pilot run as possibly being "his only bite at the cherry" and so he tried to cram everything he could into those half-dozen openings. In a mad rush he covered fantasy, animals, musicals, animation, and myths, legends and fairy tales, but from this original stress on very young children's cinema, the appeal of the programmes has gradually shifted towards an all-family audience, although the central focus remains on young people.

Graham Murray is fortunate in combining his job with a life-long interest in film which he can trace back to his childhood when, at the age of six, he laid his hands on a self-cranking 35mm projector. He operated this with old silver nitrate film, which is dangerously unstable, and one day the inevitable happened as it all went up in flames.

However, this experience failed to diminish his enthusiasm which found a new outlet in frequent visits to afternoon matinees at the local fleapit. He sadly regrets the virtual extinction of the type of film he saw then which was aimed at the whole family rather than a specific audience as is usually the case now.

He has been particularly interested in investigating the special techniques and skills that go into film making and presenting them in the programme. As a child, and indeed as an adult, he has always held a great fascination for the nuts and bolts side of the cinema, and he is confident that most other people share his view.

Many of their programmes leave the studio to look at films on location as with the one on Bugsy Malone, or they take one aspect of the process such as sound effects or carpentry and put that under the microscope. A recent Clapperboard visited the new James Bond set of a huge submarine pen which was supposed to be inside the hull of a supertanker, and the way this project had been tackled and constructed was analyzed in some detail.

Muriel Young, the producer, who is also in overall charge of children's output for Granada and used to appear on television herself, explained that Clapperboard never wished to demolish any new film and therefore the programme had excellent relations with the film industry. Their attitude on the programme was to preview rather than criticize, and if a movie was completely disasterous they would prefer to ignore it than be faced with panning it.

Although television had been partially responsible for the decline of cinema, she regarded one of the primary aims of Clapperboard as stimulating children to go out to see films. As Graham Murray remarked, "We don't want the British film industry to die".

Another aspect of the programme that concerned Muriel Young related to the content of many films produced today. Most programmes include several film clips and these have to be chosen with great care for the late afternoon audience. Generally nothing with an X or AA rating is screened, but she takes personal responsibility for checking on what is acceptable and what is left out.

"I've got a little bell in my head which sometimes rings like mad. If I have that feeling then whatever has caused it is out." Language is also seen as a problem, and sometimes a film is shown with the offending parts of the soundtrack dubbed over.

Clapperboard's weekly mailbag of around 50 letters, predominantly from children and old age pensioners, is proof of its popularity. Graham Murray has noticed a trend over the past few years for more requests to arrive from school children which run along the lines: "Please can you tell me all about cinema as I have to do a class project on it?"

The usual reply includes a couple of book references and a note explaining that the cinema is a very wide subject. However, it is interesting to note that increasingly schools are regarding movies and the film industry as serious topics for study and clearly Clapperboard itself would be a valuable resource for anyone undertaking work in that area.

Although films from last year's 10 best amateur productions have appeared on programmes, I was surprised to find out that there was no intention to show some of the excellent films made in many schools up and down the country. Such an opportunity occasionally to see children's work on television would surely do much to enhance the practical film movement in schools, as well as giving a sense of achievement to the film makers.

In the near future Clapperboard will cover topics ranging from theatrical costumiers and choreography to a programme on "cops and robbers" which will take a closer look at stuntmen. Finally, I asked Muriel Young to sum up the programme in a few words: "It aims to enhance the magic of the cinema, giving its viewers a privileged peep behind the scenes."

Women and children last

As part of a campaign for more nursery schools in the Southwark area of London, the local trades council recently staged a day of linked events. Supported by groups as diverse as Surrey Docks Action and the National Council for Civil Liberties, the day's programme included an exhibition of photographs and a film.

The photographs, Who's Looking after the kids?, were by Trisha Ziff, a final year fine art student at Goldsmiths' College, University of London. The 50 prints began by exploding the woman's world of work with standard portrayals of a bus conductress and a fork-lift truck operator among others. There was a group on "Shopping . . . it isn't easy with young children, pram and groceries", presenting an all too familiar picture outside the Tesco supermarket.

This first section was completed by a dismal view of the urban landscape in which so many families are forced to live while bringing up children: the bleak and impersonal high-rise together with inadequate play spaces. The point was directly made: "The majority of women have two jobs—looking after a home and family as well as going out to work."

The second part of the exhibition covered the more positive side of providing day nurseries, playgroups and adventure playgrounds, although these remain a dream for many people who, at best, have to make do with sympathetic family relations or often ill-equipped private childminders. At worst young children are left with older brothers and sisters. Some are even left to fend for themselves.

The most memorable sequence of pictures focused on the daily life of Lorraine, a young mother with a two-year-old daughter who is expecting her second baby soon. One photograph of the heavily pregnant woman squeezing past her daughter to hang out washing on the narrow public walkway at the front of their flat summed it all up. As the caption said: "Lorraine cannot afford a private nursery place, and it is impossible to get one in a local authority centre—if she had this she would change her part-time job cleaning a local bakery for a full-time one."

The film, One Two Three, in colour and lasting 30 minutes, was made by a group who set up a children's community centre in the Highgate Newtown area of north London. Some of those involved, like Sue Crockford, the film's producer, had professional experience in media, and although it took many months to make on a shoestring budget, the result is good.

The film opens with a series of women talking about the difficulties of working and bringing up children and traces the history of the centre from the Women's Liberation demonstration held in London in 1971. A short-life terraced house was given by Camden Council and in 1972 it opened for business with the aim of becoming "not just another playgroup, but a truly collective effort".

The scheme is run by a weekly meeting of any parents or centre workers—who are largely volunteers—who discuss all aspects of the place from individual children to work rotas and the wider political issues of what is being done.

One of the fundamental principles of the centre's philosophy is that children should be encouraged to develop freely and grow in self-reliance: "We encourage girls to be more adventurous and boys to be more gentle". Books revealing sexist attitudes are rooted out and there is even a special adult workshop on children's literature.

One of the most encouraging elements of the way the place is run relates to the attitude on achievement: "The kids don't have to compete for affection here as they have to in schools—like getting sums right". Another point that comes over all through the film is that the centre is the product of energy and pressure applied by highly-motivated middle-class women who are able to give up time to work there. This is briefly touched on, possibly too superficially.

The fact remains that authorities are just not able or willing to fill the yawning nursery gap. One Two Three rejects the possibility of such experimental alternatives becoming a long-term solution to the problem. Instead, the film proposes that the new values practised by the centre should be more effectively incorporated into an expanded state system.

One Two Three, 16mm colour, 30 minutes, is available for hiring at £9 from: Children's Community Centre, 123 Dartmouth Park Hill, London N19.

Think Before You Build: the need for an architect
On hire from Concord Film Services, Nacton, Ipswich, Suffolk. 16 minutes, colour.

A house extension, the enlargement of a bookshop and the remodelling of a public house interior are given as three examples in this film of small scale building works which have benefited by the client using the services of an architect. This happens in only a third of this kind of work carried out in this country. Yet in value for money, fitness for purpose and pleasure for the user there is much to gain from using an architect, as well as the likelihood of a better environment.

Sponsored by the Royal Institute of British Architects as promotion for the work of its members (and probably this is a unique use of film to further a particular profession) it might be argued that the small local builder working in the traditional forms might do as good a job without an architect.

Dog days

Hire (free of charge) from Guild Sound and Vision Ltd, Woodston House, Oundle Road, Peterborough PE2 9PZ, 22 minutes, colour.

Dog Timmy is tied up by his 12-year-old boy owner while shopping at the supermarket. But Timmy is frightened by the traffic and slips free to end up eventually in the Battersea Dogs Home. Johnny Morris (who wrote as well as speaks the commentary) describes the dog's plight and gives many facts about the home and how it is run.

Founded originally in 1860, it now deals with some 18,000 dogs a year found in the London area, as well as cats. Johnny Morris tells his story in his own inimitable way, from the dog's point of view much of the time—the lost mongrel, the Alsatian too big for his owner's flat, the Colonel's Golden Retriever turned loose when his master died.

Children and pets go naturally together, so there should be a warm reception for this film in schools as well as a useful message.

Evocations

The Cotswolds
The Peak District
Available for hire, free, from the Shell Film Library, 25 The Burroughs, Hendon, London, NW4 in 16mm film or on video cassette.

These two new 20-minute films from Shell are, despite their titles, very much general interest documentaries rather than travelogues. Each aims to capture the flavour of the region rather than give a rundown on everything there is to see. And for this reason they are both entertaining and informative, even if you have no intention of actually visiting the places.

The Cotswolds of course are a natural for any film; the Shell one concentrates on their architecture: the churches, manor houses and farms, built so attractively in honey coloured limestone.

It was the local wool merchants of the Middle Ages, trading all over Europe, who first brought riches to the area. In the picturesque villages and towns, some of the buildings they put up then can still be explored today. Sheep still graze too on the hillsides which, as the film evocatively shows, are among the most beautiful in Britain.

The Peak District rivals the Cotswolds for scenery. In the film, the desolate remoteness of the Northern Peaks is vividly contrasted with the softer beauty of wooded valleys like Dovedale. Even though many of these can only be explored on foot, they are not short of visitors; the film does not, however, dwell on just how many converge there at holiday periods.

But the Peak District is by no means just scenery. For instance, you see an unusual boat trip through Speedwell Cavern, and a flooded lead mine. Although miners once toiled there for 15 hours a day, the veins of lead never yielded profitable quantities so the mine turned out to be an expensive failure.

Very different is a visit to the magnificent Chatsworth House, palace of the Dukes of Devonshire, or to Haddon Hall which dates back to medieval times and was restored by the Rutland family this century. The film also shows the intricate preparations for the unique Well Dressing Ceremonies which take place at Tissington every year.
